I learned in a recent visit to many countries that the Russian leader had achieved an image of peace of which I was unprepared to learn. I think there would be a great merit in having the President of the United States take the initiative in a dramatic way, by calling a halt for an extended period of time to the kinds of tests which contaminate the world's atmosphere and the kinds of tests which can be detected no matter by what power conducted.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wish to say that I was very much impressed by the arguments advanced by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee last year, as I continue to be impressed by those arguments.

It was for that reason that I proposed last year that the United States take the initiative at Geneva to seek a ban on atmospheric tests in the hope that we could salvage that much out of the negotiations, and in the hope that the Soviet Union might agree to such a ban on the tests which contribute most to the contamination of the air, and which could be policed by control stations already in existence on either side of the Iron Curtain.

Such a ban, I then said, would curtail further poisoning of the air, while we continued to seek acceptable ways to police a ban on tests in other environments.

Moreover, I wrote to Mr. Herter, who was then Acting Secretary, that the commencement of an international control system to detect atmospheric nuclear explosions is the sine qua non of man's progress toward any feasible disarmament. This is so, even though a control system for such tests is much less complicated than a control system for a comprehensive ban.

On April 13th, the President, by letter to Chairman Khrushchev, said that the United States was prepared to consider a ban on atmospheric tests. He said:

> Could we not, Mr. Chairman, put the agreement into effect in phases beginning with a prohibition of nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere? A simplified control system for atmospheric tests up to 50 kilometers could be readily derived from the Geneva experts' report, and would not require the automatic onsite inspection which has created the major stumbling block in the negotiations so far.

This, of course, was essentially the proposal I had made in February. I was gratified that this was so, and, although the Soviets rejected the proposal, that they reacted to it by making the important concessions I have previously mentioned.

Notwithstanding that progress was made in the remaining months of 1959, we find the conference again in a position very similar to that which existed 11 months ago. Once more, the prospect is for failure or stalemate at Geneva, unless something is done.

The same concern, which caused me to make the proposal I did in February, has moved me to write once again to the Secretary of State. In a letter which I sent to him Friday, January 8, I broadened my proposal for a staged test ban agreement. I added two important modifications which I felt were dictated by the present status of the negotiations.

We must continue, I told the Secretary in my letter, to strive for an agreement which would end all nuclear weapons tests, not only those in the air, in the water, and above the air, but those underground as well.

However, should it develop, upon the resumption of the conference, that this objective cannot now be achieved, owing to continued Russian refusal to accept our new criteria for a control and inspection system upon which all might safely rely for the detection of underground tests, and the conference is deadlocked thereby, I urged that the United States make the following two-part proposal:

> (1) That the three powers agree to a suspension of all further nuclear weapons tests in the air, in space, and in the water, to be enforced by an international control system sufficient to detect and report any violation; and
> (2) That the three powers concurrently agree to jointly conduct a series of underground nuclear explosions, which will add no further contamination to the air, but which may form the basis for fashioning a mutually acceptable detection and inspection system with which to police a subsequent ban on underground nuclear weapons tests.

I suggested that such joint underground tests might well be conducted under the auspices of the United Nations, and that qualified observers from all interested countries might be invited to participate.

As I wrote the Secretary, I think such a proposal would have great advantage for the United States and the world. First and foremost, by immediately banning the tests which poison the air and the water, we would erase a grave anxiety.

Additionally, we would establish the first international control apparatus for the enforcement of the suspension agreement. Although the system would be simpler than that required to detect underground tests, and the onsite inspections to which the Russians object so strongly would not be necessary, nevertheless we would have, as to the air, space, and water ban, a functioning harness within which to bind not only the present members of the nuclear club, but also the oncoming nations developing atomic technologies of their own. In this the negotiating parties would seem to share a common interest.

I believe, moreover, that the series of joint underground tests could represent the best hope for solid progress in achieving a ban on underground nuclear weapons tests, with a workable international control system to enforce it. The proposal for a ban limited to air, water, and space tests, while this joint exploration on the nature of underground test detection proceeds, could prove to be a mutually acceptable forward step toward our goal.

My suggestion for joint tests stems from the realization that in the science of seismology areas of uncertainty exist. The tests to be jointly conducted would advance the general knowledge about the problems of identification and detection of underground tests. I cannot help but feel that the lack of ample data concerning underground tests might well be the underlying reason for the inability of the scientists to reach agreement now upon the requirements for a reliable detection system. We have conducted only four or five underground nuclear tests, and the Soviets have never indicated that they have conducted any. A heavily instrumented series of underground tests, in the Soviet Union and in the United States, and at other points on the globe, would certainly yield resulting data of significant importance.

It may be that the Russian negotiators will rebuff the suggestion for joint underground tests. But it is well to remember that the Russians were a suspicious people long before the Communists came to power. The czars maintained their own Iron Curtain. The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], rightly said, following my mention of this fact to the Senate last March, than an understanding of this puts the matter in perspective and gives us more hope for the future than if we attribute all difficulties simply to the present regime. We cannot know, in any case, that the Soviets would rebuff the proposal unless we make it.

The United States has always been dedicated to the cause of peace. We are answerable to our own trust. We ought not anticipate failure as a reason for abandonment of new proposals even before making them.

My proposal, I repeat, is an alternative to stalemate and deadlock. Perhaps some unexpected move by the Soviets will change the situation. But there is little that can change the fundamentals of the situation—the need to make a start toward disarmament, to end the threat of further contamination by fallout, and the desirability of extending knowledge in the matter of identifying underground disturbances.

Mr. President, good conscience commands that we do our utmost at Geneva.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of my letter to Secretary Herter be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 8, 1960.

HON. CHRISTIAN HERTER,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On Tuesday next, January 12, the Geneva negotiations for a treaty to end nuclear weapons tests will resume. Although the resumption is not auspicious, and prospects for success seem gloomy indeed, there is cause for hope in the progress already made, and more reason than ever for not permitting impatience or frustration to jeopardize continued efforts toward agreement.

The unresolved issue remains inspection. The inability of the recent technical conference of scientists from our country, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union to reach agreement on such matters as the significance of the Hardtack data for the detection of underground nuclear tests, and the criteria to determine when the source of a signal registered at a control post can be investigated by a mobile inspection team is, of course, a formidable obstacle to successful negotiations.

Last February, I wrote to you urging that the United States, without slackening its efforts for an end to all nuclear tests, seek a limited ban on atmospheric tests to stop pollution of the air.

Such a proposal was made to the conference at Geneva following the Easter recess. Although the suggestion was rejected, the Soviet Union made significant new concessions which enabled the conference to continue to move forward.

I still beleive that the United States must do everything in its power to prevent the test ban negotiations from ending in a stalemate. They are not only important in themselves. Their outcome has significance for the entire future of disarmament. If the United States and the Soviet Union cannot agree to end their tests of nuclear weapons under effective inspection safeguards, then upon what can they agree? Surely almost any other disarmament proposal would have even less likelihood of acceptance than a ban on tests of nuclear weapons.

Therefore, it seems to me that we must continue to strive for an agreement which would end all nuclear weapons tests, not only those in the air, in the water, and above the air, but those underground as well.

However, should it develop, upon the resumption of the conference, that this objective cannot now be achieved, owing to continued Russian refusal to accept our new criteria for a control and inspection system upon which all might safely rely for the detection of underground tests, and the conference is deadlocked thereby, I would urge that the United States make the following two-part proposal:

(1) That the three powers agree to a suspension of all further nuclear weapons tests in the air, in space, and in the water, to be enforced by an international control system sufficient to detect and report any violation; and

(2) That the three powers concurrently agree to jointly conduct a series of underground nuclear explosions, which will add no further contamination to the air, but which may form the basis for fashioning a mutually acceptable detection and inspection system with which to police a subsequent ban on underground nuclear weapons tests.

I think such a proposal would have great advantage for the United States and the world. First and foremost, by immediately banning the tests which poison the air and the water, we would erase the grave anxiety.

Additionally, we would establish the first international control apparatus for the enforcement of the suspension agreement. Although the system would be simpler than that required to detect underground tests, and the on-site inspections to which the Russians object so strongly would not be necessary, nevertheless we would have, as to the air, space, and water ban, a functioning harness within which to bind not only the present members of the "nuclear club," but also the oncoming nations developing atomic technologies of their own. In this, the negotiating parties would seem to share a common interest.

I believe, however, that the series of joint underground tests, which might well be conducted under the auspices of the United Nations, and to which qualified observers from all interested countries might be invited, could represent the best hope for solid progress in achieving a ban on underground nuclear weapons tests, with a workable international control system to enforce it. The proposal for a ban limited to air, water, and space tests, while this joint exploration of the nature of underground test detection proceeds, could prove to be a mutually acceptable forward step toward our goal.

I cannot help but feel that the lack of ample data concerning underground tests might well be the underlying reason for the inability of the scientists to reach agreement now upon the requirements for a reliable detection system. We have conducted only four or five underground nuclear tests, and the Soviets have never indicated that they have conducted any. A heavily instrumented series of underground tests, in the Soviet Union and in the United States, and at other points on the globe, would certainly yield resulting data of significant importance.

I respectfully submit these suggestions to you, Mr. Secretary, as a possible proposal to present to the Russian negotiators. I do so with the conviction that we must continue to demonstrate to the world that if the test ban talks fail, the Soviet Union must bear the guilt.

Sincerely,

FRANK CHURCH.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield to my good friend the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I wish to congratulate the able Senator upon his learned address and upon his dedication to the cause of peace, which must be based upon international understanding and confidence.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much. I wish to say that in the matter of the Geneva negotiations we have shared a common interest, and that the counsel and thinking in this matter of the Senator from Tennessee have always been of great importance to me.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT FOR BOULDER CITY, NEV.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, January 4, 1960, is a date of lasting significance to Nevada, for it marks the emergence of Boulder City as a municipality within the framework of our State, and its severance as a federally controlled city.

Laid out by the Bureau of Reclamation as a model American community, Boulder City owed its existence to the construction of the great dam on the Colorado River.

Since 1932, it was administered by the Federal Government; yet there was a growing demand upon the part of the residents for home rule. Along with my colleagues in Congress, I was privileged to assist in legislation which paved the way for the transfer of the city from its Federal status to local control.

Mr. President, I wish to pay tribute to the many outstanding citizens of Boulder City who worked long and faithfully for the goal of municipal freedom. At the same time, I believe it only fitting and proper to commend the Bureau of Reclamation for the outstanding job it did both in administering the affairs of the bustling community of 4,000, and in cooperating wholeheartedly in the orderly transition of government.

At this juncture, in my remarks, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks made at Boulder City's inaugural ceremonies by the Honorable Grant Sawyer, Governor of Nevada, and Robert Broadbent, mayor of the new city, along with appropriate editorials which appeared in the Boulder City News and the Las Vegas Review-Journal, and a news story published in the Las Vegas Sun.

There being no objection, the remarks, editorials, and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY GOV. GRANT SAWYER

Mayor Broadbent of Boulder City, Acting Regional Director West, Federal, State, county and city officials, and Mayor Broadbent of Ely, I welcome this opportunity of celebrating with you this long awaited moment—as Boulder City takes her place alongside her sister cities in Nevada.

Also I bring warm greetings from one of you who shared the difficulties and long wait involved in bringing home rule to Boulder City. I am speaking of Dick Ham, who is now executive director of the department of employment security and is busy in Carson City preparing his department's legislative program for the coming session and, therefore, unable to be here with you tonight.

Too many people in this Nation take the right of self-government as a matter of course. There can be no danger of this in Boulder City. This day marks the end of a 20-year effort to remove this city from Federal control and give it incorporate status. And this day marks the beginning of a bright future for this city, as you yourselves guide its destiny. The story of this transitional period is well known to you here, but permit me to trace the progress of this effort.

Boulder City started as a tent community in 1931 with the beginning of construction on Boulder Dam. Growth was rapid but controlled and the guiding hand of the Bureau of Reclamation is evident in the modern, well-planned community in which you live today.

It was some 20 years ago that Government officials realized Boulder City had outgrown its role as a construction and operating camp. It was agreed that the city should be turned over to the people for self-government. The machinery was put in motion with the approval for studies of the transitional problem.

In 1949, Dr. Henry Reining, Jr., then professor of public administration and political science at the University of Southern California, was engaged to make a survey and submit specific recommendations for a solution. His report a year later was the basis of an order issued by the Secretary of the Interior in 1951 which administratively separated Boulder City from the Boulder Canyon project. The Boulder City Act of 1958, under which incorporation has been achieved, generally followed Dr. Reining's recommendations.

That act provided an orderly method for the Federal Government to relinquish ownership and control of certain properties in the community not required for continuing Federal activities in the area and permitted you to establish self-government under Nevada law.

Director West has informed me that the Bureau has disposed of all its residential properties within the city, totaling 179 housing units. These units, appraised by FHA at $1,225,000, were sold to Federal employees who were priority purchasers. This property is being placed on the Clark County tax rolls.

He also told me the Bureau of Reclamation is transferring ownership of the 33 square miles of land provided by the Boulder City Act to the incorporated city. This land also will be placed on the Clark County tax rolls.

I note also that Boulder City has been the recipient of neary $3 million worth of electrical, water, and sewerage systems, municipal buildings, streets, sidewalks, and curbs, parks and parkways.

In short, Boulder City is ready to do business. It begins, not as a municipal infant crying for recognition and struggling for success, but as a community that has added much to the lore of Nevada and whose citizens have helped make the State what it is today.

With your incorporation, you hold a trust and a duty—to yourselves, your city, your State and your Nation. Some may think it absurd that Boulder City, a community of less than 4,000 persons, has any great part to play in national or world affairs.

But our freedom is not based on the masses, it has its roots in the individual. If America cannot solve its problems on a community level, how can it hope to solve the problems of the world.

From the individual's faith in his own worth, to his voluntary role in his own free community, to his own community's service to his nation, and to his nation's dedication to the common cause of all free men—thus is the force of the faith of freedom steadily raised to a higher power.

We can serve freedom elsewhere only as we practice it in our own lives.

We cannot speak of a common law for all nations of the world, unless our own laws faithfully serve the needs, and guard the rights, of our own citizens.

We cannot speak of equality, both of men and nations, unles we advance the flag of social equality in our own community. We cannot be aghast at poverty in distant lands, if our own citizens are in want.

We cannot hope to spur economic progress and prosperity in the world unless such a State as Nevada can itself help to lead America toward new horizons of equal opportunity for all our citizens.

We cannot pretend to help inspire new nations in the way of freedom if our own schools do not give our own youths the chance to become enlightened citizens.

We are called upon to conduct ourselves like free men with the will and the wisdom to make freedom work. We do this not simply by what we say—but by how we live. This is your challenge. I know you can meet it.

I mentioned education, the value of which cannot be overemphasized. America must work, perhaps hardest of all, on the field where the future can be won or lost: in our schoolrooms. We must attack the problems of juvenile delinquency.

Perhaps in this field the rest of the Nation can look to Boulder City for guidance. The rate of juvenile delinquency here is one of the lowest in the Nation. In Boulder City, youth is not hidden or apologized for, it is proudly displayed.

A crash-emphasis on education hit the country following the Soviet Union's achievements in rocketry. We heard a spate of alarms calling for more mathematics, scientists, and technicians.

But Boulder City didn't wait for sputnik to call for emphasis on education for its young people.

Mr. Elbert B. Edwards, your widely known high school principal, reports the percentage of Boulder City High School graduates going on to college tops 70 percent.

Nevada has seven young men in the selective Air Force Academy. Four of them are from Boulder City—Mike Hyde, David Lyon, Scott Wood, and Roger Likens.

In any National Merit Board or National College Board test, Boulder City is sure to be represented at the top levels. And in the area of education, all eyes will be on Boulder City with the construction of the new experimental educational facility—a multipurpose building designed to meet the needs of all school districts. It will be the only one in the country. Now in the hands of the architects, the building is the result of millions of dollars put into research and engineering by the Ford Foundation, and contributions by the New York and Stanford educational facilities laboratories.

From education in the schools, we proceed to education in government. In this your city officials are the instructors and the pupils. I could take the time to point out the good qualities of your new officials and how the future of the city is safe in their hands, but I won't. One of the blessings of a small community is that you intimately know your candidates and have a solid basis for their election. You know what kind of a performance to expect from them.

To Mayor Broadbent, City Manager Curtis Blyth, Assistant Mayor Dr. Thomas White, Councilmen Morgan Sweeney, Albert Franklin, and Joe Manix, City Attorney Alvin Wartman, and all the others, I offer as advice, in a purely nonpartisan way, the words of Franklin D. Roosevelt. He said:

"New ideas cannot be administered successfully by men with old ideas, for the first essential of doing a job well is the wish to see the job done at all." I know these men have the wish to see the job done and I feel sure new ideas will always find a welcome at city hall.

This is a happy time in Boulder City. It's a new year for a city with a new look. Right now things look rosy and the future's problems are faint. You've won a long, hard struggle for independence, but the time for rest is far distant. Your real struggle lies ahead. Things which are minor and a matter of routine will present problems here because you'll be encountering them for the first time.

Your municipal path won't always be smooth. Mistakes will be made in the natural course of things. Lack of mistakes too often means lack of progress.

You are fortunate in that many of the mistakes open to you have been made before and you will have the chance to profit by the missteps of others.

There will probably be times when you wish you had never heard of home rule. When this time arrives, I advise a look at the words of James Gould Gozzens, who said:

"Every day is a miracle. The world gets up in the morning and is fed and goes to work, and in the evening it comes home and is fed again and perhaps has a little amusement and goes to sleep. To make that possible, so much has to be done by so many people that, on the face of it, it is impossible. Well, every day we do it; and every day, come hell, come high water, we're going to have to keep on doing it as well as we can."

On behalf of the rest of the citizens of the State, I bid Boulder City welcome to its rightful place. Congratulations to Nevada's newest city.

REMARKS BY ROBERT BROADBENT, MAYOR

It is an honor, as mayor of Boulder City, to be privileged to accept the contract to effectuate the Boulder City Act of 1958, on behalf of the city council and citizens of Boulder City, Nev.

By accepting this contract, we, the citizens of Boulder City, are embarking on the challenging road to self-government. The responsibilities and duties and operation of local self-government we accept under the laws of the State of Nevada, the county of Clark and the Boulder City charter.

Many have contributed greatly to bring about the realization of Boulder City, incorporated. Our appreciation and sincere thanks are extended to the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, and Mr. Arleigh West, the acting regional director of region 3, for their fine cooperation, assistance, and the advice they have given in the months in which we have been so diligently working on the transfer of Boulder City.

Our city manager, city attorney, city clerk, and the members of the many boards and commissions appointed by the city council have worked hard—with untiring effort—to help make it possible for us to take over the operation of our city today.

Each individual in Boulder City has contributed toward our goal. It is they who make our city what it is and what we hope it will be.

Digressing briefly, I should like to personally and publicly thank my wife and family, and the wives and families of all who have been required to be away from the responsibilities of home, for so many, many hours during this transition period.

We, the officials of our city, are grateful for our fine citizenry and with honor and humility solicit full and continued cooperation to the end that we may enjoy through our united efforts an honest, forthright, economical city administration capable of expanding with the growth of our community.

Boulder City has been unique among her city sisters. It is our sincere desire that this uniqueness will be added to in the future.

We have all the basic needs for growth and development—fine people, good resources. With diligence and united effort, Boulder City will be Nevada's city of dreams come true.

MORRY'S STORY

(By Morry Zenoff)

This newspaper today records for posterity Boulder City's first official day of freedom—January 4, 1960—and the signing by its mayor, Robert Broadbent, of the city's own declaration of independence.

From 2 p.m. Monday when the little band of city officials gathered in Arlie West's conference room on the hill, there to observe Broadbent's actual signing of transfer documents—until 9 p.m. that evening, when some 300 interested citizens crowded into the grade-school gym to witness solemn ceremonies celebrating the occasion, it was one series of historic happenings.

Every phase of it was photographed by Government and private photographers—and the best of the shots were collected and engraved and included in this freedom edition—which some day for sure will be studied by your children and your children's children, and ours too, as a symbol of democracy in action in the 20th century.

Every word spoken officially from script was collected by our staff and set up on the linotype machines, then placed in pages, locked up and printed on the pages you're now reading.

The newest laws of the city, passed by special council action minutes before midnight of the transfer date—January 4—are contained, too, in this souvenir edition under legal notices—detailing to the populace the law of the land which is now and forevermore in effect.

No longer will the will of the minority rule; no longer must the citizenry rush to Washington to seek favor or license; no longer must a community turn to the hill for regulation or interpretation.

Today, the laws of the State of Nevada and a charter written by the elected representatives of the community, and ordinances drafted by an elected city council—these all run the city—through home rule—by majority vote, by citizen control.

At every step of Monday's thrilling walk to freedom—familiar faces were evident everywhere—the oldtimers who came before us (12 years ago) and the newtimers who came here since us—all taking in every word, each experiencing the fine fresh air.

Those who fought against home rule and incorporation now stood shoulder to shoulder with those who fought for it—a fine symbol indeed of what the future will offer in the way of unified work toward the common goal of all—a continued beautiful Boulder City.

The speakers of the day—from the Governor, through Dr. Henry Reining, to the mayor—all were as thrilled to be taking part in our day of history as were the spectators in watching and listening to them play the roles given them.

It was a wonderful day for everyone who lived it. It will be a wonderful city now—for those who live in it, or near it.

Surely, none will forget January 4, 1960—emancipation day for Boulder City, Nev.

WELCOME TO THE FAMILY

Nevada welcomed a strapping teenager into the family of cities this week when the erstwhile Government community of Boulder City severed its ties with the Federal control and branched out on its own as a true Nevada city.

Boulder City was established back in 1931, when the Government began the task of constructing Boulder Dam. It was laid out by the Bureau of Reclamation as the "model city" and it became just that when it was completed around 1932. Since that time, until January 4, 1960, it was operated as a Government community with the citizens having little to say about its government.

Now, the burdens of government have been taken over by the citizens of the city. They have elected Robert Broadbent as the community's first mayor. From now on the problems of growth will be in the hands of the new mayor and his city council.

In the decade which is just starting, it is probable that many changes will be noted in the operation of Boulder City. Undoubtedly it will grow much as the other cities in southern Nevada have grown. It has all the potentials of becoming a recreational city and for establishing some light industry in the area around the city's fringes.

Growth has been almost completely stymied by the Government restrictions which were clamped on Boulder City. For many years property in the community could only be secured on short-term leases. None could be purchased. Recently longer term leases were developed and, as a result of this move, more and more construction was done.

Now, with all restrictions removed, it is entirely possible that capital can be enticed to make investments in the sector. Every indication points to a decided building boom in Boulder City.

As with all growing cities, there will be problems to be faced. While the liquor and gambling issues probably will not be raised in the immediate future, they are bound to come and there will be some bitter fights resulting. Other issues will be raised which will see the city split down the middle. It has happened in Las Vegas, North Las Vegas and Henderson and undoubtedly will occur in Boulder City.

The citizens of Boulder City must have faith, not only in the future of the community itself, but its elected officials as well. The latter are going into a very complex job and, being human, they probably will make mistakes. However, they all are respected citizens of Boulder City and will have the future of the city at heart. Unless they get too far off the deep end, the citizens should give them tolerance, cooperation and confidence. Theirs will be a tough job. They will have to set the policies upon which the future will be built. If they build solidly, which we believe they will, the future of the city is assured.

Operation of the city as a civic entity rather than under governmental control, will be a tough transition. We are confident, however, that the people of Boulder City will be able to make the bold step.

We welcome Boulder City into the family of Nevada cities, and hope the future continues as bright as it is now.

GALA CEREMONY BEGINS BOULDER HOME RULE

(By Laura Bell)

BOULDER CITY.—With high hopes for a bright future and every promise that the hopes will be fulfilled, Boulder City was launched on the American way of home rule at ceremonies in the elementary school gymnasium last night.

For the 29 years of its existence up to yesterday it was under Federal control as headquarters for Hoover Dam.

The Federal Government represented by A. B. West, region 3 director of the Bureau of Reclamation, signed over the pretty little model community to Gov. Grant Sawyer of the State of Nevada and Mayor Robert Broadbent, youthful first mayor of the new incorporated city.

West extended the best wishes of Secretary of the Interior Fred Seaton and Commissioner of Reclamation Floyd E. Dominy, whose schedules did not permit them to be present for the ceremony.

He also noted that Senators ALAN BIBLE and HOWARD CANNON and Congressman WALTER BARING had sent word that they were unable to attend because of the beginning of the new session of Congress this week.

"Many of you have joined with the Department of the Interior, your Members of Congress and State and local officials in working diligently many years for this day on which we officially sever Boulder City from Federal apron strings," he said.

The complicated and controversial problem was not easily solved and took many years of effort, he noted; but said he was convinced that the efforts which culminated in passage of the Boulder City Act of 1958 will pay off bountifully.

"We of the Department of the Interior feel that the Federal Government is turning over to the incorporated citizenry the finest little city in the world," he said.

Accepting the contract for the State of Nevada, Governor Sawyer commented on the beauty and high quality of Nevada's newest city and said the State was proud to accept such an addition.

Governor Sawyer welcomed Boulder City to her rightful place alongside her sister cities in Nevada.

"Though many people in this Nation take the right of self-government as a matter of course," he noted, "there can be no danger of this in Boulder City" because of the 20-year effort to bring about home rule.

Boulderites were warned by the State's chief executive, "With your incorporation, you hold a trust and a duty—to yourselves, your city, your State and your Nation. Some may think it absurd that Boulder City, a community of less than 4,000, has any great part to play in national or world affairs.

"But our freedom is not based on the masses, it has its roots in the individual. If America cannot solve its problems on a community level, how can it hope to solve the problems of the world?"

Residents were advised not to expect perfection from their new city officials since mistakes will be made in the natural course of things.

"Lack of mistakes too often means lack of progress," Governor Sawyer observed.

Mayor Broadbent noted that, in accepting the contract, the citizens are embarking on a challenging course.

The responsibilities and duties and operation of local self-government we accept under the laws of the State of Nevada, the county of Clark and the Boulder City charter.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PARTY POLICY

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, many scholars and students of government have written and spoken upon the operations and responsibility of our two-party system. This concern of the party system arises from the fact that it is only through the operations of the two-party system that the mass of our people have a meaningful choice and method of giving direction and mandates to their government. It would follow, then, that the policies of our two major parties, the manner of their formulation and execution, and the responsibility of the parties and their agencies are of vital concern to all citizens.

Party policy, both of the majority and the minority, is surely a matter of vital concern to all Members of Congress and to the people of their constituencies.

Almost from the beginning of the organization of government under the Constitution, the democratic process in the United States has been characterized by the formulation of public policy and the molding of public opinion through a strong two-party system. Almost throughout our history the Congress has been led by a majority party, but with a strong and challenging opposition from a minority party. Third parties have had little success and surely play no significant role now.

Like many others, I have been concerned with the formulation of the policies of the Democratic Party in the U.S. Senate. I have expressed this concern in speeches on the floor of the Senate and in other ways. It seems to me that a method of formulating party policies in the Senate that is representative of and responsive to the majority will of the Democratic Senators is necessary to a responsible performance by the Democratic Party.

That is particularly true now, when the President of the United States is a member of the Republican Party. Unless the Democratic Party in Congress has some orderly way of formulating legislative policy, the only organ I know of which undertakes from time to time to announce party policy to the country is the advisory committee to the Democratic National Committee, most members of which do not hold an office to which they have been elected; whereas in the Senate there are 65 Members who have been chosen as the nominees of their party in their respective States, and who have been elected by the people of their States to this responsibility.

This subject has been a matter of legislation. It has been a matter of frequent debate in the Senate. I debated the matter in the Senate last year. It is a matter of public interest. It is surely a matter of interest to every Democrat in the United States. More than that, it is a matter of concern to every citizen, because it goes to the heart of the responsibility of the party and of the operation of the two-party system, in which all people, as I have said, have a concern.

I say these things in a general way, Mr. President, because I am concerned with a current interpretation of the purpose and role of the Democratic senatorial policy committee, by some, that this committee is merely an arm of the Democratic leadership of the Senate. I do not accept this interpretation. It does not comport with the purposes for which the policy committee was created. It neither comports with democratic procedure nor complies with the principle of responsibility of an agent to a principal.

In my view, the Democratic policy committee is, or should be, an agent of the conference of Democratic Senators.

The Senate Democratic policy committee should represent all the Democrats in the Senate, not merely one. The Democratic policy committee of the U.S. Senate should operate in the study and in the formulation of policy, working with all the Democratic Senators. It should be elected by the Democratic Senators. This goes to the heart of democratic procedure within the Democrat Party.

One can understand, then, Mr. President, why at the conference of Democratic Senators last Thursday, I found it impossible to accept the dictum that the Democratic policy committee is "an arm of the leadership."

Perhaps it would be helpful to review briefly the history of the Democratic policy committee, the purposes for which it was created, and the manner of its creation. The Democratic policy committee had its genesis in the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress. It was this committee, which was headed by the late Senator Robert M. La Follette, Jr., and then Representative, but now Senator, A. S. MIKE MONRONEY, which recommended the Reorganization Act of 1946, by the terms of which Congress now operates. The committee held long hearings on the problems of the Congress and the manner in which it could be more representative of, responsive to, and more effective in implementing the public will and party policy.

I should like to read two sentences from the recommendation of this committee.

Recommendation: That both the House and the Senate establish formal committees for the determination and expression of majority and minority policy. The majority and minority policy committees in both Houses would be appointed by their respective majority and minority conferences.

From this, Mr. President, it is perfectly clear that the Monroney-La Follette committee recommendation which gave birth to both the Republican and Democratic policy committees in the U.S. Senate did not envision the policy committee as a mere "arm of the leadership." Quite to the contrary, the report clearly recommends the establishment of majority and minority policy committees which would meet at frequent intervals "to formulate the overall legislative policy of the two parties." Moreover, as I have already said, it recommended that these committees be appointed by their respective majority and minority conferences. Perhaps it would be appropriate to read the entire section of the joint committee report with respect to this particular subject. That I shall now do.

MAJORITY AND MINORITY POLICY COMMITTEES

Strong recommendations were made to your committee concerning the need for the formal expression within the Congress of the main policies of the majority and minority parties. These representations called for some mechanism which could bring about more party accountability for policies and pledges and announced and made in the national platforms of the major political parties.

These recommendations were based on the theory that in a democracy national problems must be handled on a national basis. Only through the expression of the will of the people by their support of political parties on the basis of their platform pledges can the majority will be determined. Likewise the minority viewpoint is also expressed in support of the minority platform.

No one would claim that representative democracy as we know it today could exist without majority and minority parties. The 435 voices of the House and the 96 of the Senate would be confused babel of conflicting tongues without party machinery. Instead of unorganized mob rule where the strength of varying viewpoints cannot be measured or determined, party government furnishes a tug-of-war in which the direction and strength of opposing viewpoints can be more or less accurately measured and weighed.

Under the American party system there are always two main groups, each checking the other and offering the choice of alternative courses of action. Around these two groups Congressmen can rally and express themselves, helping in party caucuses to determine the policy for their group.

Your committee recognizes the need for freedom of action on the part of the individual Member of Congress and his right to vote at any time against the announced policy of his party. But we feel that if party accountability for policies and pledges is to be achieved, stronger and more formal mechanisms are necessary. The present steering committees, an informal and little-used device, seldom meet and never steer.

We recommend that these be replaced with the formal establishment in the House and the Senate of majority and minority policy committees. The majority policy committees of the two Houses would meet jointly at frequent intervals, as would those of the minority, to formulate the over-all legislative policy of the two parties. The majority policy committee of each House would also hold frequent meetings to consider its role in expediting consideration and passage of matters pledged to the people by their party.

On issues where party policy is involved the decisions of these policy committees would be formally announced in the proceedings of Congress and formal records would be kept of such decisions. No member of either party would be required to follow such announced party policy except as he chose to do so. Each member would be free to vote as he saw fit, but the record of his action would be available to the public as a means of holding both the party and the individual accountable.

1. CREATION OF POLICY COMMITTEES

Recommendation: That both the House and the Senate establish formal committees for the determination and expression of majority policy and minority policy. Each of these four committees would be composed of seven members appointed in its entirety at the opening of each new Congress. The majority and minority policy committees in both Houses would be appointed by their respective majority and minority conferences.

We feel that in the establishment of such policy committee, the Congress chosen at the last general election should be controlling and that the policy-committee membership should therefore be chosen at the beginning of each new Congress. Membership on all policy committees would automatically expire at the close of each Congress.

Mr. President, the minority party at the time of that report was the Republican Party, but it became the majority party the following year. The majority leader was the late Senator Taft, of Ohio. As I understand, the Senate Policy Committee of the Republican Party follows those recommendations rather closely. I find it rather strange that the procedure for determining legislative policy within the Republican Party in the Senate is more democratic than the procedure for determining party policy—if we have such procedure—within the Democratic Party in the Senate.

Upon the recommendation of the Monroney-La Follette committee the Senate passed a bill which contained the following provision:

SEC. 244(a) It is the sense of the Senate and the House of Representatives that the majority party and the principal minority party in the respective Houses should each at the beginning of each Congress appoint a policy committee, consisting of seven members, for the formulation of overall legislative policy of the respective parties.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually for each policy committee the sum of $30,000 for the maintenance of a staff to assist in study, analysis, and research on problems involved in policy determinations. The members of each such staff shall be appointed, and their compensation fixed, by the policy committee concerned, but no such compensation shall be fixed at a rate in excess of $8,000 per annum.

The above provision was not accepted by the House, but the Senate proceeded promptly upon its own to establish its own majority and minority policy committees. The Senate included in the legislative appropriation bill—passed within a few days after the reorganization bill became law—legislative provisions which, in effect, authorized the establishment of policy committees and the employment of staffs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield; or does he prefer to proceed at this time?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Tennessee has been reading from the text of the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In that text it is provided that the majority party and the principal minority party shall appoint the policy committees. It does not say that the majority leader and the minority leader shall appoint the committees; the text states that the parties shall appoint the committees. Is that true?

Mr. GORE. That is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And therefore the Senator from Tennessee is laying the basis for indicating that it was the intent of the Senate that the policy committee should be the agent of the party.

Mr. GORE. That is clear, it seems to me, from the report of the Committee on the Reorganization of the Congress, from the bill S. 2177, 79th Congress, as introduced in the Senate, from the bill as passed by the Senate, and also from the measure which finally became law, the First Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1947 which was based upon the committee's recommendation, and which is the legislative basis for the Senate policy committees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the Senator from Tennessee is correct. I merely wanted to raise this question, in order to point out, at the very least, the original intent of the bill as passed by the Senate.

Mr. GORE. I thank the able Senator from Illinois. The provision was contained, as I have read it, in the bill which passed the Senate. The provision was not accepted by the House. When the House would not accept the provision, the bill was passed without it.

But to show the intent of the Senate, the Senate proceeded within a very few days to attach a legislative rider to an appropriation bill; and that rider did, in effect, authorize the establishment of policy committees in the Senate and the employment of staffs therefor. I should like to read that provision, which was contained in the First Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1947, and which was passed in August 1946. I shall now read the provision, which today is the law:

> For maintenance of a staff for a majority policy committee and a minority policy committee in the Senate, consisting of seven members each, for the formulation of overall legislative policy of the respective parties, the members of such staff to assist in study, analysis, and research on problems involved in policy determinations, and to be appointed, and their compensation fixed, by the policy committee concerned, at rates not to exceed $8,000 per annum in any case, $15,000 for each such committee, in all, fiscal year 1947, $30,000, to be available at the beginning of the 80th Congress.

Note, Mr. President, how closely the language of the provision which became law followed the provisions of the bill recommended by the Monroney-La Follette committee, and adopted as a portion of the reorganization bill which was passed by the Senate.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. I wish to remain in the Chamber, to listen to all of the Senator's speech, for I am greatly interested in what he has to say. However, several persons are waiting for me, in my office.

So at this time I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee. I know he will have a good answer to it, and therefore I wish to give him this opportunity to answer it: In light of the fact that the whole matter of how the policy committee should be selected is on the agenda for tomorrow, to be discussed behind closed doors, at a caucus called for that purpose where we of the Democratic Party can determine what action we should take with respect to this entire problem, I am curious to know why the able Senator from Tennessee wished to make this speech today, here on the floor of the Senate, in public, before all the press, as he is now doing. I am curious about that.

Mr. GORE. I was sure the junior Senator from Florida would be curious about it, and I shall be very pleased to satisfy his curiosity.

For one thing, this is a matter about which I am deeply concerned; and this is not the first time I have expressed such concern on the floor of the Senate. The people of Tennessee have honored me with an opportunity to be a United States Senator. In consequence of that honor and that office, I have the privilege of speaking in this forum; and that is one of the greatest privileges which can come to a man. Here one can be heard. Behind closed doors one can be steamrollered.

This is an issue which I think concerns all the people, because it goes to the heart of the responsibility of our parties; it goes to a method of determining party policy.

I should like to point out to the Senator that last year, without party policy, one committee dealt in one way with the interest rate problem; another committee dealt in another way with that problem. No one could tell us what the policy of the Democratic Party was, unless one wished to acknowledge that the advisory committee to the National Committee constituted such an authoritative organ for policy.

I take it that the Senator does not recognize that group as an authoritative spokesman for the party. Where, then, is there to be, and how is there to be, a formulation of legislative policies of the Democratic Party? As a result of the lack of party policy, as a result of the constant compromise of principle, we ended the last session in virtual rout on the economic issues.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I want to satisfy the Senator's curiosity. I think this is important to every American, not just to the Senators who are going to meet behind closed doors tomorrow. Yes, I will have an opportunity to have my say there, and I will say some things there that I will not say here—perhaps——

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Just a moment, and I will yield. But I have some things to say here as I have the opportunity which I feel it is my duty to say to all who will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This is not a matter for the sole determination of Senators behind closed doors. Every Democrat in Florida should be interested in this, and I hope every Democrat in Tennessee is interested in it. I will certainly undertake to interest them in it.

Now I yield further.

Mr. SMATHERS. I am sure the Senator knows nobody questions his right to rise in the Senate and discuss anything about which he has convictions.

Mr. GORE. I understand the Senator has not quesitoned my right; he has expressed his curiosity.

Mr. SMATHERS. I was interested in your discussion in light of the fact that we know proposals were made for caucuses, having an opportunity to settle this type of question at them. I remember an argument made against the caucuses was that we could come to the floor of the U.S. Senate and debate the problems. I remember the argument was made in opposition to the proposal of the Senator from Pennsylvania that we really did not have to have a caucus, because a Senator could come to the floor and speak, as the Senator from Tennessee is doing, without inhibition, or limitation and to the whole world. But, the counterargument was made—and it prevailed—that we should argue things that have to do with party workings, washing our dirty linen, in our own party caucuses. I sort of subscribed to that practice, and I understood the Senator from Tennessee did. Therefore I have been at a loss to understand why he comes on the floor now. That is the reason why I was curious.

Mr. GORE. In the first place, I do not regard this question as being purely and strictly one of concern to Democratic Senators. As I have said, I think this is of interest to all our party members. Indeed, it is of interest to many independent citizens in the United States who do not have an affiliation with either party, because it goes to the heart of the operation of our two-party system. As our population continues to grow, multitudinous as it is, with 180 million people, it will be only through clear-cut choices, if there are any clear-cut choices any more between the two parties, that the American people will have a meaningful, constructive way of expressing a choice and giving direction and a mandate to their Government.

If we compromise with principle, if we wind up with the Democratic Party almost indistinguishable from the administration's party, then how, I ask, will the American people have a clear-cut choice?

I should like to have the distinguished Senator from Florida tell us what the Democratic Party policy is with respect to any issue which he wishes to choose, how that legislative policy has been determined in the Senate, and what means we have now to determine such policy.

Mr. SMATHERS. I would say, irrespective of whether we do or do not have such means, that the whole debate involves a matter of mechanics and machinery. At least, that is what I thought. I thought that was the reason why we were to go into caucus tomorrow. That is the reason why I have felt, and many other Senators have felt, that from time to time we should have a caucus, as the Republicans do, which, as the Senator from Tennessee has explained, appear to be successful. However, I have not noticed that they stand on their side of the aisle and air their particular divisions for the whole world to see. Yes, I think they discuss them in caucus. I have not been invited to them. I have not been privileged to learn what they think their problems are. And I think they are wise in not advertising them.

I doubt the wisdom of once again pointing out, as I think everybody recognizes, some divisions in our own party, and the additional problem of how we should proceed to determine policy. I understand that the real purpose of the caucus was to state our positions, which naturally could be stated more freely in caucus, without the necessity of saying the same thing on the floor of the Senate, and without having it misunderstood as it goes out over the wires or radio and television.

If we are to argue the issues here on the floor today, there is no sense in arguing the same things in caucus tomorrow. May I mention this one complimentary thing?

Mr. GORE. Yes, indeed.

Mr. SMATHERS. I know the Senator from Tennessee is absolutely sincere about what he is doing here. I know he has deep convictions about it. I know he is a loyal and dedicated Democrat and patriot. I understand all that. I think what he is talking about in the realm of determining policy has merit to it. I just wonder about the wisdom of rising on the floor of the Senate at this time and talking about it, and now broadcasting it to the public, in light of the caucus which has been called for tomorrow to determine these questions among ourselves. That is what aroused my curiosity.

Mr. GORE. I will have some further comments to make about that in a few moments. But the junior Senator from Tennessee asks the junior Senator from Florida to name one legislative policy of the Democratic Party, to outline, if he can, any formal procedure the 65 Senators belonging to the Democratic Party in the Senate have for determining a policy.

The Senator from Florida responded to my question by saying, "Irrespective of that situation," and then he proceeded to make a statement. I wonder if the able Senator from Florida would be able to tell me—and I am entitled to curiosity the same as the junior Senator from Florida is——

Mr. SMATHERS. Surely.

Mr. GORE. I am curious to know what he regards the policy of the Democratic Party with respect to housing to be.

Mr. SMATHERS. I should like to say, in answer to the able Senator from Tennessee, that one of the great virtues—or vices, I do not know which——

Mr. GORE. Well, now, there is a good deal of difference.

Mr. SMATHERS. I think there is a great deal of difference between them, but I am not sure whether in this instance what I am going to say is a virtue or a vice. I will leave that to the good judgment of the Senator from Tennessee. But one of the good things about the Democratic Party is that we cannot tell a Member what to do. The distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico said he did not care—and I applaud him for his position—how many Members got together and stated what they considered the Democratic Party's position and tried to tell him the way he should vote. He said the people of New Mexico sent him here and no Senator was going to bind him nor dictate to him as to how he was to vote.

I join with him in that noble sentiment. I was not sent to the U.S. Senate to go into any room with any group of people, even fellow Democrats, and have them tell me how I should vote on housing, agriculture, debt management, or on anything. The only people to whom I am responsible are the people of my State of Florida, who elected me to come here to represent them in the best possible way I could.

I ran on the Democratic ticket. The Democrats voted for me, I am delighted to say, and then sent me here to do that which I thought best for them and the Nation as a whole.

I do not know of a single Senator present who feels as though he is going to be bound by any statement of an advisory council, or of a caucus of any nature, or anything else. The whole purpose of the caucus, as I understood, is to converse about these matters, to see what is the middle ground and to see if there is anything upon which most of us can agree.

It would obviously always not be correct to assume that we could get the senior Senator from Illinois, who sits here, for example, to agree with the able senior Senator from Virginia. We could not get the Senator from Mississippi and the senior Senator from Minnesota to agree about civil rights. We could not get the Senator from Rhode Island to agree with the Senator from Oregon about farm problems. We have considerable division about these things.

We do not even have a policy with respect to reclamation which represents 100-percent unanimity.

However, we try to get together as best we can as they do in any legislative body, to give and take, to see what course we can follow with which most Senators will agree. That is what we have been doing.

I think we have been pretty successful, because even though a President of one party won by a tremendous margin of votes in 1952 and again in 1956, we have nonetheless been able to increase our representation in the House and Senate, despite having to contend with this great personality. We have been able to do this, in my opinion, because the people believe the Congress has been reasonable, responsible, and sensible. The people have voted for our candidates, for our platforms, and for our course of action, as vague as they may sometimes appear to be. The people have voted for us, in the final analysis, and that is the test.

The Senator says, "Look at the Republicans; they have been perhaps a little more democratic than we." I can only say I doubt they have been, but certainly their course has not been as effective as ours, because we have been defeating them in every election.

I make these remarks with deep affection for my friend, who knows I mean sincerely what I am saying. I have the utmost admiration for the Senator from Tennessee. I am in sympathy with what he is saying. I think he is ringing a bell, but I do not think he is ringing it at the right address, on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, first I thank the able junior Senator from Florida for his generous remarks.

The Senator said he would leave it to me to judge whether in his remarks he was describing a situation which could be considered a vice or a virtue. I choose to apply the word "virtue" to the freedom of choice which my friend says every Senator must have.

I should like to read from the report of the Monroney-La Follette committee, which I read before the distinguished Senator entered the Chamber, on this particular point:

> On issues where party policy is involved the decisions of these policy committees would be formally announced in the proceedings of Congress and formal records would be kept of such decisions. No member of either party would be required to follow such announced party policy except as he chose to do so. Each Member would be free to vote as he saw fit, but the record of his action would be available to the public as a means of holding both the party and the individual accountable.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I will yield in a minute.

Mr. President, I have asked the able junior Senator from Florida to name one instance in which he knows the legislative policy of the Democratic Party in the Senate—to show one way we have of developing in a formal way an effective and meaningful policy. The Senator has not answered.

We have a way of developing one. I shall answer my own question to some extent by saying that in the caucus, or in the conference, we can develop one. This is one effective and meaningful way to develop a policy and to announce formally the policy to the country.

Then the junior Senator from Tennessee would have to accept his responsibility, with the Democrats in Tennessee, as to whether he followed such a policy or whether he did not. As the situation is now, there may be a coalition of a few Democrats and enough Republicans to bring a bill to the Senate even though the bill does not represent the view of the majority of the Democrats in the Senate. As a result of the coalition, a bill may be enacted into law without any yardstick ever having been established to show that it was contrary to the legislative policy of the Democrats in the U.S. Senate.

Before yielding further, I should like to amplify my answer to the Senator as to why I consider this to be a proper subject for debate on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMATHERS. Could the Senator help me by answering one question on that point?

Mr. GORE. I will answer further, and then I will yield.

For one thing, what we are discussing is a matter of legislation. The genesis of the policy committee, the authorization for its establishment and for the payment of its staff, is a matter of legislation. The membership is said to be seven. How did the number come to be more? I do not complain about there being more members. I think there should be more.

I think the rank and file of our party ought to know that on the Democratic policy committee of the Senate there is only one member from north of the Alabama line and east of the Mississippi River, the very distinguished and able Senator, the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

I think we should have a policy committee which is something more than an arm of the leadership. We should have a policy committee which performs the functions and assumes the responsibilities envisioned in the Monroney-La Follette committee report.

Furthermore, I think the membership of the committee should be increased so that the committee will be more truly representative of all the Democrats in the Senate and of their constituents and so that it will be representative of all the great geographic sections of our country.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Florida has one additional question.

Mr. SMATHERS. I have only one question.

Mr. GORE. I yield to the junior Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. Even if somebody wished to agree with everything the Senator from Tennessee has been saying, with respect to the verity of his argument about policy and how to get it, I think, however, that person could also logically say that this forum in which we speak today is not a caucus and is not a conference of Democrats, where these intraparty matters are supposed to be decided. On the contrary, this is the floor of the Senate of the United States, where we are bringing out into the open once again the washing, so to speak, our "dirty linen."

Mr. GORE. This is not "dirty" linen; it is simply faulty linen.

Mr. SMATHERS. Very well; faulty linen. If this were a Democratic caucus we would not see the able and distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] sitting here. We would not have a room full of people. We would not have a crowded press gallery looking down on us.

Perhaps we could decide this question in a party caucus. In a caucus each member would be free to vote as he saw fit. Perhaps we could decide some issues but I do not believe we Democrats are going to be able to decide anything on the basis of what we do this afternoon on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator wished to ask me one further question.

Mr. SMATHERS. I do not have another question. I merely wished to make that observation, in all good conscience and good spirit.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me. As I say, I am not unsympathetic with the argument he is making. I am only a little doubtful whether the forum in which he is making it is the correct forum. I have been wrong before. I may be wrong in the future, and I may be wrong now. But I do not believe I am.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in the first place, the Democratic Party is the party of the people. I do not mind the people knowing my views on this subject. I do not mind the people knowing whether the party has or has not a means of formulating Democratic policy in the U.S. Senate. I want my constituents to know my views on this question, and this is the proper forum for a Member of the U.S. Senate.

I say again to the able junior Senator from Florida that this problem cannot be interpreted as purely a problem to be decided within the Democratic caucus, because the Congress enacted a law on the subject.

Furthermore, the Democratic Party in the Senate must go back to the basic legislation, containing the authorization for the payment of the staff of the committee. Therefore, the problem cannot be dealt with exclusively in the Democratic caucus.

There is one further point. I am not so naive as to think that this problem will be settled in the right way if no public notice is given as to the existence of the problem. I have been in public life for a few years. What little accomplishment it has been my opportunity to achieve has been in direct ratio to the extent of public information as to my efforts. Therefore, I am glad to accept the impeachment of the Senator's curiosity, and I am pleased to tell him that I am speaking as a Member of the U.S. Senate on a problem which goes to the very heart of the operation of the two-party system in the legislative branch of our Government. I do not think that is exclusively the privilege of either the Republican caucus or the Democratic caucus.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I promised to yield to the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I shall now prove a point in connection with what I said in the conference the other day, namely, that if three Democrats get together, it is impossible to get two of them to agree with the third.

With all due deference, and with no personalities whatsoever being involved, I shall remain on the side of my good friend from Tennessee this afternoon.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I feel that we can settle more party policy on this floor than in a million conferences.

Our friends on the other side—and I note the presence in the Chamber of my good friend from California [Mr. KUCHEL]—are supposed to be democratic in their way of thinking. They meet every day; but look at them.

Mr. KUCHEL. I hope my friend is not referring to my facial expression. [Laughter].

Mr. CHAVEZ. No; nothing like that at all.

We are not going to determine in a party caucus whether we are to have housing legislation. We are not going to determine in a party caucus whether we are to have civil rights legislation. We are not going to determine in a party conference whether we are to have progressive legislation and liberal legislation. The only time I ever had an opportunity to vote on liberal legislation was when I entered a big fight with my good friends from the South on the fair employment labor practices bill. At that time I occupied the seat in this Chamber now occupied by my friend from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. I handled the legislation from my committee.

Party policy, so far as Democrats are concerned, will be determined here. Let us get to work and vote for the legislation by which we intend to make policy. To become irritated after listening to someone talk does not accomplish anything.

I repeat, that no party conference is going to bind me. I wish to find out what I am voting on, and not what the members of a party conference may think or say behind closed doors. I want the public to know the facts. I want the people of New Mexico to know how I stand and how I vote.

I, for one, am glad that the Senator from Tennessee is making the speech which he is delivering, even though I do not agree with him entirely.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator for his generous remarks.

I agree with the Senator from New Mexico that it is difficult for Democrats to get together. If I wished to live in perfect harmony with all members of my political party, I would join the Republican Party.

Mr. MORSE. That would be a mistake.

Mr. GORE. But I do not want to be a Republican. I want to be a Democrat.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. I think there is one important difference between the original voting position of the able senior Senator from New Mexico, and that of the very able Senator from Tennessee. When the question was first discussed the other day at our Democratic conference the able Senator from New Mexico said he did not believe any caucuses were necessary, because Senators could come to the floor and do exactly what the Senator from Tennessee is doing. But the Senator from Tennessee and other Senators said no, or implied that they did not agree, but that we should have a caucus, and there discuss such questions. That is the basic difference. I was one of those who agreed to a great extent with the able Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. GORE. But the Senator did not vote that way.

Mr. SMATHERS. On the contrary, the Senator from Florida did vote that way. As a matter of fact, there was no vote, but the Senator from Florida was prepared to so vote.

The point is that when the issues which are considered in the caucus are eventually brought to the floor of the Senate for debate, we can then get up and speak our piece, and let the people know where we stand. And we do not have to be bound by any discussion in the caucus, but we have had the benefit of it.

The type of meeting which I envisioned at the caucus was a meeting to decide when to bring issues to the floor of the Senate, and the most strategic way to bring them up. There was no effort to close the door on any Senator. All that was involved in the conferences which some Senators wanted was getting together on a policy which most of us could follow, and then bringing the issue to the floor of the Senate, so that every Senator could speak his piece.

That is why I applaud the able Senator from New Mexico, because he is consistent in his position.

Mr. GORE. I thank the able Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wonder if my good friend will bear with me momentarily, in order to keep the record straight.

Mr. GORE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Like Al Smith, I say, Let us look at the record.

This is not the first time that the question of a conference or policy committee has been discussed. Let me say to my friend from California [Mr. KUCHEL] that I remember when we were in the minority, not so long ago. On February 4, 1953, we met behind closed doors in a minority conference of Senate Democrats. At that time my good friend from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], who is at present the majority leader, was then the minority leader.

He and I had a little colloquy, and I should like to quote from it:

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, with all due deference to the minority leader, I, as one Senator, would like to find out from the President what his ideas are. I am willing to use my own judgment in trying to cooperate with him in his desire to carry out his ideas. However, the point I should like to make is that the decision of the minority policy committee is not the decision of the minority. After all, I do not want the minority policy committee to make a decision for me. I should like to use my own judgment.

After all, the President of the United States is entitled at least to a fair chance to try to carry out what I consider to be the mandate of the American people. However, I should like to ask the minority leader at this time if it is expected by him that what the policy committee decides is to be the decision of the minority Members of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the minority leader merely read to the Senate the statement which was adopted by the minority policy committee. He did not attempt to speak for any Member of the Senate other than the members of that committee.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I know, but what——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to finish my answer to the Senator from New Mexico. If the Senator will read the statement and then assume the same position which the nine members of the committee assumed, well and good. If he does not care to do so, of course, the Senator may—and I know he will—express his own personal viewpoint.

In other words, the way I understood the minority leader's answer at the time was that he was expressing only the opinion of those who had met with him as members of the policy committee, and did not intend in any way, shape, or form to bind individual Members of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish the RECORD to be clear that the minority leader at that time, the Senator from Texas, did not at any time try to contend that they represented the majority of the Senate, or that they wanted the majority to be bound by their decision.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator. I should like to make one further suggestion to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS]. I was not one of those who originated the motion in the conference the other day for regular Democratic conferences. I was one of those who felt that we should not ignore the sentiment of so many of our colleagues who wished to have more Democratic get-togethers and discussions. I did not share the enthusiasm and hopes for party conferences which some of my colleagues expressed or felt. I thought, since they desired them, we should have some. However, I would not want in any respect to have the junior Senator from Florida take from me the privilege of discussing a public issue on the floor of the Senate, an issue which I have discussed many times heretofore on the floor of the Senate, just because I thought we should accede to the wishes of so many of our colleagues for some Democratic conferences.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to join the Senator from New Mexico in commending the Senator from Tennessee for taking the floor this afternoon. I am delighted that all of this is coming out in the open, not being leaked from behind closed doors supposedly clothing conferences or caucuses of Democratic Senators.

In that connection I should like to say that I was very much surprised to read in the paper this morning after last week's conference or caucus that there was literally a rebellion going on against the leadership on the Democratic side. It just was not so. I told the reporters who spoke to me about it that it was a harmonious meeting. One of the people who did the most to maintain a great degree of harmony was the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. That is how I got into it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is right. I believe that caucuses are a waste of time. I believe we would lose more votes than we would probably gain, because stories will get out of the conferences which will overemphasize something of perhaps a somewhat spectacular nature, or contain only partial truth.

If we discuss issues in which we are interested, such as housing, aid to education, civil rights, and so forth, down here on the floor of the Senate, the newspaper people up there in the gallery will get an accurate report of what is said down here. I would hope that we would do our arguing and our quarreling and our debating out in the open.

As I understand, the Senator from Tennessee says—and I quote him—"This is the proper forum." I believe we will accomplish a great deal more here on the floor than in caucuses, from which stories are bound to be leaked. Those stories will contain half truths, and the result will be that the Democratic Party will be set against itself, and we will be furnishing fodder to the Republicans, who are sitting over there just laughing and enjoying themselves no end. I do not blame them.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I understand——

Mr. GORE. I understood the Senator from Montana to say that in his opinion caucuses would do that, and not what the junior Senator from Tennessee said.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not a fact that the Republican Party has been holding caucus after caucus during the last 5 or 6 years?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I understand that they have been having luncheon after luncheon.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. And they have lost man after man because of it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I believe the Democrats have been gaining Members in the Senate because of the responsible and constructive way we have conducted ourselves.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Do I understand that the Senator from South Carolina is suggesting that here is some type of undercover urging by the Senator from Tennessee that the holding of caucuses could defeat more Senators on his side in the next election?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. All I know is that as a result of caucuses held by the Senator's party, newspaper stories have been printed about Republican Senators fussing among themselves in the caucuses, and that some of the Senators who came up for election later were defeated for some cause or other.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for not more than thirty seconds for another statement.

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. On that point I should like to say that I have been admonished by some of my fellow Republicans on this side of the aisle to be very careful about accepting any recommendation from the other side of the aisle as to how we can increase our membership on this side of the aisle.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is good advice.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say once again that I am not one of those who believes that frequent conferences of the Democratic Party will solve all our problems, or even, necessarily, develop a party policy. What I feel very strongly about is an effective, working Democratic policy committee performing the functions for which it was created. That is my concern. My concern is with an effective Democratic policy, perhaps above the necessity or the desire for having so many party conferences. That, I will say to the Senator from Montana, is my principal concern.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Before I go into my next topic, I should like to express the hope that, if we have a conference tomorrow, the members of the press will be in attendance, so that they can get a true and accurate story of what goes on, and not what is leaked out to them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator from Tennessee in his discussion has been very accurate in his historical background of the legislation and the proposals emanating from the Monroney-La Follette idea for the reorganization of Congress—as far as he goes.

However, I believe there is another point I should bring out, and that is that on January 2, 1947, the next year, there was a meeting of the Democratic caucus under the leadership of the late Senator Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky. I now read from the minutes of the conference:

Senator Barkley then stated that the conference should discuss and determine the procedure to be followed in connection with committee assignments and questions relating to the steering committee and the minority policy committee, created by Public Law No. 663, 79th Congress (1st Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1937).

Senator Barkley stressed the importance of the newly created policy committee—stating that while, of course, it was necessary to work as closely as possible in cooperation with the majority, it would necessarily follow that the policy committee as a group would work in close association with the President.

Incidentally, I think the committee is misnamed—

A Democratic President.

Senator Barkley suggested that the conference first discuss the question of the minority committee assignments. Senator McKellar, of Tennessee—stated that in his opinion the minority policy committee should be elected by the conference.

The predecessor of the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee—

Mr. GORE. That shows that Tennesseans can be right twice.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, indeed, but wrong when it comes to the votes.

Senator Barkley stated that the question of how membership on the policy committee should be filled would be taken up later in the meeting.

The conference then discussed the minority policy committee heretofore referred to, and Senator Barkley repeated his previous statements regarding the committee. Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, recalled the suggestion previously made by Senator McKellar that membership on the minority policy committee should be filled by election by the conference. Senator O'MAHONEY addressed the conference and submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the chairman of the conference be authorized to appoint the membership of the minority policy committee, provided for by Public Law No. 663, 79th Congress, and that he is hereby named chairman of such committee."

The resolution offered by Senator O'MAHONEY was adopted by voice vote. (Senator McKellar, of Tennessee, voting in the negative.)

I thought the Democrats ought to know that, because that was done by the democratic action of the Democratic conference.

Mr. GORE. I do not think the record should be necessarily interpreted as indicating that there was only one vote in the negative. The usual custom is that, when there is a voice vote, no one's vote is recorded except when an individual says he wishes to be recorded either in the affirmative or the negative. I do not know whether on the voice vote in question there was only one negative vote, and the record does not say.

My esteemed predecessor, in my view, was right. He was a great Democrat, and he advocated democratic procedure within the Democratic Party. I am proud to be following in his footsteps in this particular regard.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator from Tennessee is just as distinguished in his own right as was Senator McKellar.

Mr. GORE. I thank my able friend from Montana.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for yielding. I would be happy if I could have the attention of the distinguished junior Senator from Montana. The Senator from Montana, in his remarks a few minutes ago, indicated that there had been leaks from the conference last week.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Leaks which had given an improper indication of what took place at the meeting.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. I read the Washington newspapers, the New York newspapers, the Philadelphia newspapers, and other Pennsylvania newspapers quite carefully. In my judgment, there was nothing in any of those news accounts which incorrectly reported what took place at the conference.

The majority leader, in my presence, was interviewed by reporters immediately after the conference. With his permission, I sat with him. The account which he gave of the conference was completely accurate. With his permission, I made a slight addition, which he thought was equally accurate. So far as I am concerned, there was nothing in any of the newspapers which gave the slightest reason for believing that anything had been done or said which could be construed as an attack upon the majority leader, either before the conference or afterward.

Neither do I think there was any reason to infer from any of the press accounts that there was a wide split in the Democratic Party which was causing difficulty.

I myself think—the junior Senator from Montana was there, and he will have his own view—that the conference was conducted in a mature, orderly manner; that everyone was in good humor; that there were no voices raised; and that there was just the kind of democratic discussion of important issues which, in my judgment, should take place far more frequently in the future than has been the case in the past.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In other words, it was a harmonious meeting.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is what I said. But did the Senator see what some of the newspapers said, did he read what the Washington Post said, that there was an indication that there was an uprising against the majority leader? But the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, and the Baltimore Sun made no such statements.

Mr. CLARK. I read the Washington Post, and I saw nothing in the article which was inaccurate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Did the Senator read the headlines? I read the article, too. But it is the headlines which attract attention to the news accounts.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I had intended to make one thing perfectly clear before I finished. I think now is the time to do it.

My motion in the Democratic conference does not arise out of any hostility to the leadership of the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [LYNDON JOHNSON]. I have stated these views previously. He and I had a debate on this subject last year. My esteem for him as a Senator, as a man, and as a leader has been expressed on the floor many times, and in many other ways and many other places. I think the senior Senator from Texas, the Honorable LYNDON JOHNSON, is the ablest Democrat who has served as Democratic leader in the Senate in my lifetime. Should there be any further question? This is a matter of principle; it is a matter of party responsibility, party policy, and party performance. It is not a matter of personality. I would certainly resist any such interpretation being placed upon my efforts.

I wish to make one other point clear. I have no objection to the present membership of the Democratic policy committee. Each member is my personal friend; each is the object of my esteem and affection. My concern arises out of my desire to see the Democratic Party have a fairly effective way of formulating policy and announcing that policy to the country, and then letting each Member consider his own responsibility in voting. But let the rank and file of our party and the people of the country have a yardstick by which to measure any Senator's party loyalty.

Unless there is some sense of party responsibility, the workings of the two-party system will break down in its end goal, which is to give to the people clear-cut choices.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I was not in Washington at the time the discussions took place, which have been mentioned. All I know is what I have read in the newspapers, except what I have heard today. I should like to put a question to the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. GORE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CARROLL. I want to ask the Senator from Montana about the resolution passed in the 1947 Democratic conference. I think the Senator has read it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CARROLL. How have the policy committees been appointed since 1947? Was it by virtue of some resolution?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; by virtue of some resolution and by virtue of the fact that each majority leader appoints to any vacancy which may exist.

I point out that the present majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], has appointed two members, and only two, of the present policy committee. One is the senior Democrat in this body, the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]; the other is my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. In the latter respect, I believe I am correct—and I observe the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] on the floor; he can correct me if I am in error—in stating that the majority leader went to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], to former Senator Lehman, and other Senators, and asked whom they wanted to have named to the policy committee. If I am correct, it was on their recommendation to the leadership that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] was placed on that committee. Am I correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that is substantially true. My memory is not perfect, but I think that is substantially true.

Mr. CARROLL. At the time the resolution was passed, was the Democratic Party in the Senate the majority or the minority party?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It was the minority party. I think we had 43 Members, if I remember correctly. But the President was of the Democratic Party.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to ask a further question in regard to the caucus, about which I received notification only this morning.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The notice was sent out only on Saturday morning, on the initiative of the majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and before a letter—supposedly being sent—was received by the leader or anyone else; I refer to a letter asking that a conference or caucus be called.

Mr. CARROLL. That is the way the matter was reported by the press in Colorado.

I want to commend the leadership for calling the conference. After listening to the colloquy, I suppose we are discussing some of those questions at this time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to say I think the Senator from Tennessee has performed a real public service by bringing out this matter on the floor. I hope that we Democrats never arrive at the point where we have to reach our decisions behind closed doors. Let us use this public forum, and thus let all the people know of our differences and how we reconcile them.

Mr. GORE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me say that I agree with the Senator from Montana.

I have listened to the colloquy between the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Montana. Certainly there is no dirty linen to be washed here. The Senator from Tennessee has said we are dealing with basic principle, and that is the question here. There is nothing to hide. But we should not be afraid to air or ventilate or fumigate if it becomes necessary. I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether it is his purpose today to discuss broadening the membership of the policy committee.

Mr. GORE. Yes; and if possible to spur its functioning in accordance with the responsibilities and the purposes for which it was created.

Mr. CARROLL. In other words, as I read the law and as the Senator from Tennessee has indicated, it contains nothing which states that a Democratic caucus cannot elect the members of the policy committee. But because of a resolution which was adopted by a Democratic conference some years ago, and which seems to be continuing in nature, some of us who were not here at that time are bound by its provisions.

Today our party is in a different position. It is no longer a minority party; it is now the majority party, and has a majority of almost 2 to 1. As some Member has said, since the resolution was agreed to, the population of the country has increased by 20 million persons. So far as I know, never before has our party had so large a majority.

Our own majority leadership talks about responsibility. Certainly we have responsibility—not only to the Nation, but also to the people who form the Democratic Party.

Is there any reason why intelligent men cannot sit down and discuss who they wish to have serve on the policy committee?

Mr. GORE. I know of none.

Mr. CARROLL. Is there now any reason why intelligent men cannot enter the caucus room, and invite there the newspaper reporters, if necessary, to talk about something which I believe is more fundamental than the membership of the policy committee—namely, the membership of the steering committee? This is the crux of the matter. Such decisions should not be made by only one man or by a small group of men. All of us have had sufficient experience to know that it is our job never to permit too much power to be placed in the hands of one man or in the hands of a small group of men. The essence of democracy is the diffusion of such power; and the way to diffuse it properly is to have democratic representation, by means of voting. The Senator from Tennessee knows that to be true.

In the House of Representatives, where I formerly served, I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee. The Democratic members of that committee were selected by the Democratic Members of the House of Representatives, not by only one person. I do not know how the Republican members of that committee were selected; but the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee had to run for that office. In those days, there were approximately 200 Democratic Members of the House of Representatives; and the procedure followed was to have them vote on candidates for the important Ways and Means Committee. They acted and proceeded through the Committee on Committees, which had the power to appoint the members of the other committees. The members of the Committee on Committees represented various zones. I remember that, because in those days I represented Colorado, Missouri, and, I believe, New Mexico.

I believe we can discuss this matter further in our meeting tomorrow. The discussion we have had here today is certainly in no way a reflection on the conduct of the majority leader.

Mr. GORE. Certainly I have not intended it to be.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator from Tennessee has said so clearly.

We have nothing to hide. Why cannot we open up this matter to the public? Certainly the Senator from Montana is 100 percent correct. We do not have to hide anything when we discuss party issues and party measures.

No skullduggery is involved in connection with these problems; but if there were some, it should be brought out into the open.

As the Senator from Tennessee has said, we are United States Senators, and we did not come here to bow before anyone. If we have to fight over such matters, we will fight, if that is necessary.

Mr. GORE. And multiply.

Mr. CARROLL. I had not heard about this matter before today.

I commend the majority leader for calling the conference tomorrow; and at the conference tomorrow, if it is not feasible immediately to hold elections, it should be feasible immediately to broaden the base of the policy committee; and after we broaden its base and have more chance to express our views, then we ought to move into the next phase, which is to determine how elections ought to be made to the steering committee.

I have a basic interest in that matter; I refer, not to the membership of the policy committee, but to the membership of the steering committee and how its members are selected. This issue goes to the central power of the political body.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I had finished, and I am prepared to take my seat, unless the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wish to commend the Senator from Tennessee for his masterful presentation, and I desire to ask him several questions about his position.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I wholeheartedly and enthusiastically agree with the position taken by the Senator from Tennessee. However, I wish to ask several questions in regard to the way he has presented his position.

I take it that his purpose is to arrive at an orderly, systematic method of formulating Democratic policy. Is that correct?

Mr. GORE. That is very correct. Unless we have some guidelines by which the standing committees can operate, some guidelines for individual members, we have to "play by ear"; and in that event I fear that the rendition will not be a very harmonious one.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the second place, the Senator from Tennessee is urging that the policy be formulated in such a way that, as he has stated the matter, there can be a greater sense of party responsibility on the part of all the Democratic Members of this body, and a better understanding of what our party stands for and what it seeks to do.

I believe the Senator from Tennessee has brought out most effectively, in the course of his colloquy with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], the point that, first of all, we Democratic Senators do not know what the party policy is; and, in the second place, he has pointed out that the policy of the Democratic Party should be arrived at by some representative procedure, that is, by persons who represent us. He also emphasized that the policy should be formulated, not for our direction, but for our information and guidance.

Mr. GORE. And I want to be the first—well, not actually the first, because all Members who have spoken on this subject have proclaimed their independence and their reservation of the right to vote as they please. That I will do, but I want to have formulated a legislative policy of the Democratic Party. That legislative policy cannot be formulated by the advisory committee to Mr. Paul Butler. It cannot be formulated by Mr. Butler. He has not been chosen by the ballots of the people. Here in the Congress, where the Democratic Party has a two-thirds majority of the House and the Senate, chosen by the people as Members of the two bodies and as representatives of the Democratic Party, we have the most responsible spokesmen and officials of our party on the national level. Surely this group can devise some way of formulating a policy for the party, within the legislative branch. That is what I am pleading for. I think it is necessary. Without that, the vision of the Democratic Party is blurred; without that, and with one compromise after another, we would stand before the country as a party with an indistinct position.

For instance, I favor the passage of one housing bill. After careful consideration of the views of the President, the views of the Federal officials, the views of each member of the Democratic Party, the views of my constituents, and the views of the industry involved, and after having carefully determined the provisions of a housing bill supported by the Democratic Party, I favor sending it to President Eisenhower, and then letting him determine, for himself, whether he will veto it or whether he will sign it into law. I would not "weasel" one time after another until we stood for nothing except compromise.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Tennessee is reflecting, vigorously and properly, I think, on the recommendation which was contained in the Monroney-La Follette report, as follows:

> These representations called for some mechanism which could bring about more party accountability for policies and pledges and announced and made in the national platforms of the major political parties.

I should like to say further that the distinguished assistant majority leader [Mr. MANSFIELD], as the spokesman for the leadership, has asked us—and I am sure he did not mean this to be a definitive answer—why we do not arrive at decisions like this on the floor of the Senate. I presume he believes the conference is no way to arrive at them. He was not asked his opinion, so it is not fair to imply he feels we could arrive at such decisions on the floor of the Senate, in contradistinction to the policy committee.

I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he thinks we can arrive at a party decision on the basis of this discussion on the floor today?

Mr. GORE. I hope the discussion will contribute to that end.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Perhaps I mistook the implication of the Senator from Wisconsin. I was not speaking for the leadership; I was speaking in my own capacity as a Senator from Montana, as I could speak only in that capacity, and as I always will. So far as getting anything accomplished in caucuses is concerned, it is my considered judgment that less will be accomplished in a caucus than will be accomplished in the open and through having a discussion in the forum where the ideas of Senators may be made known to the people of the country as a whole.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think the junior Senator from Wisconsin made it emphatically clear last year on at least three occasions that he believed it was desirable to come to the floor of the Senate and speak one's convictions on these matters, but I did not say this was exclusive in any sense. I think the Senator from Tennessee is eminently correct in carrying the public's business to the people through their forum. I think it is also correct, however, as some of us contend, that these decisions—I repeat, decisions of Democratic Senators can only be made in conference of Democratic Senators.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In other words, what the Senator is saying is that it is correct to bring these matters to the floor of the Senate, which is what we have been doing for many years.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That is right, but I do not see why that excludes our deciding that and other matters in conference.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It does not do so at all, but to be perfectly frank, in my opinion, the name "policy" does not apply to that committee. It is a misnomer. The closest parallel one can give is the Rules Committee in the House of Representatives, which acts as a traffic cop on all kinds of vital and necessary legislation. But I challenge anyone to point to one piece of legislation which was held up by the policy committee, at least in the past 7 years.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is exactly correct. I think this is a point the Senator from Tennessee has made very well. The name "policy committee" is a misnomer. It is not a policy committee. It performs a very important function, but it is not the policy committee of the Senate. The Senator from Tennessee is calling this matter to our attention, and what we are trying to do is infuse responsibility and policymaking authority into the policy committee.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If the Senate wants that, it can set up a policy committee and define its functions.

Mr. GORE. It has done so. I think the policy committee ought to be more than a traffic-control body. I want it to operate as it was intended. I want it to perform the functions for which, according to the record, it was created.

A part of its functions may well be to advise the majority leader in the scheduling of bills; but its functions are, or were intended to be, far broader than that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is a veteran of more than 20 years' service, and of really distinguished service, in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. He knows where policy is made. It is made in the legislative committees and is determined by a majority of the members of the committees. The policy committee, so-called, cannot go against the wishes of the legislative committees. All the policy committee can do is to expedite legislation, and we have done so very effectively. Again I say I do not know what further this committee can do. But if the Senator is interested in creating a bona fide policy committee, that can be done by majority vote of the Democrats in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. At the risk of repeating comments I have made earlier, I suggest that the able junior Senator from Montana read the recommendations of the Monroney-La Follette committee, because I think there it was envisioned that this policy committee would be selected by the Democratic Senators and that it would be a smaller group, a working group, to confer with all Senators, to meet with the caucus from time to time, but to formulate what in its opinion, after careful consideration, was the proper legislative position for the Democratic Party. Then each standing committee could be advised thereof. It was envisioned that this policy, once formulated, would be proclaimed to the world, to the Senate, in the Journal, and in the records of the Senate. Then each committee, each subcommittee, each individual Senator could perform its or his duties in the light of this promulgated policy.

As it is now, as it was last year, we dealt with the interest rate problem in one way in veterans' housing legislation and in another way in the other housing bill, and in a still different way in proposed legislation from the Senate Finance Committee, all without any determination of party policy on this very important question.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Was there discrepancy insofar as interest rates were concerned in the passage of legislation affecting housing, veterans, and so forth, and so on?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. So how could we formulate a policy——

Mr. GORE. We raised interest rates on veterans' housing, and refused to do so on long-term Government bonds. We gave way piecemeal, but not wholly.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There were differences.

Mr GORE. But we still have no policy.

Mr. MANSFIELD. To get back to the position which was adopted in the Monroney-La Follette report, it states:

> For maintenance of a staff * * * consisting of seven members each, for the formulation of overall legislative policy of the respective parties, the members of such staff to assist in study, analysis, and research on problems involved in policy determinations, and to be appointed—

And so forth.

I can repeat that policy is made in the regular legislative committees. Then their recommendations are brought to the so-called policy committee, which is really a rules committee, and our job is to expedite the legislation proposed whether or not we are in accord with it.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is accurately describing the present procedure; I am undertaking to say we should proceed further.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Then we ought to have a new committee which would really be a policy committee. It is really the rules committee of the Senate.

Mr. GORE. That is not the purpose for which it was created.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would say it has been so interpreted by Senate leaders from Mr. Barkley down.

Mr. CLARK, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

Mr. GORE. I should like very much to yield the floor. I have been speaking a long while. But I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend from Tennessee for his courtesy. I should like to ask him two questions.

Does the Senator from Tennessee agree that the jurisdiction of the policy committee should be that which was set forth in the Monroney-La Follette committee report and subsequently written into law in the appropriations bill about 10 years ago?

Mr. GORE. That is my view.

Mr. CLARK. Therefore, if the Senator's view should prevail in the conference, it would be the duty of the policy committee to formulate overall legislative policy, with a staff to assist in the study of, analysis of, and research on problems involved in policy determination, and not merely to be a rules committee?

Mr. GORE. That is my view.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point? I am trying to follow, but I did not quite understand the last part of the statement.

Mr. CLARK. I merely read from the provisions of the act and asked the Senator whether he agreed that is what the jurisdiction of the policy committee should be, and he said he did.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. My second point is this: I should like to associate myself with the view of the Senator from Colorado that the steering committee is almost as important as the policy committee, and that it, too, should be chosen by a majority of the members of the conference. This seems to me to be of substantial importance this year, but it will be of absolutely vital importance next year, when we hope to have a Democratic President, who will want to have his policy, in accord with our party's platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention in July, carried into effect by the Congress. I see no way of doing that through the democratic process unless both the Democratic policy committee and the Democratic steering committee are selected by the members of the Democratic Party in the Senate of the United States.

I should like to commend my friend from Tennessee for a very able and reasoned presentation.

Mr. GORE. I thank my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I commend the Senator from Tennessee for raising this very important issue not merely on the floor of the Senate, but before the Nation. There are, probably, certain aspects of this question which can be best discussed inside a Democratic conference, but the general proposition which the Senator from Tennessee has developed, namely, that the policy committee should be the arm of the Senators of a given party and not the instrument of the leadership of that party, seems to me to be indisputably sound. I commend the Senator for presenting that point of view with great ability.

Mr. GORE. I am very grateful for the remarks of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may say a very few words?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I commend the Senator from Tennessee. This has been a helpful discussion.

Especially I should like to have the attention of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], because he has contributed much wisdom to the discussion today.

Mr. GORE. I should like to thank the junior Senator from Montana, the whip, for his presence and for his participation. I am grateful for the presence of the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and for the presence of other Senators.

I hope this has been a helpful discussion. The Democratic Party is our party. The operation of the two-party system is a necessary part of our democratic procedure. Perhaps from this discussion will come an improvement of it. I hope that will be true.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, there is one point I should like to make. I have learned one or two simple facts, which I had not known before. Our present majority leader did not establish this policy; it was established before he became the majority leader.

Mr. GORE. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It was established by Mr. Barkley and the Democrats.

Mr. CARROLL. Yes; but that was some years ago. At that time we had control of the executive branch of the Government, but were in the minority in the Congress.

There has now been a change in the situation. The distinguished junior Senator from Montana said that we all know from experience we cannot have a policy committee which can set definite standards. Why is that so? It is because we operate under the committee system. This is why I emphasize that the steering committee represents the crux of the problem.

Suppose I were to be chosen as a member of the policy committee. I could name many Senators who would be excellent candidates. But who is so wise that he could formulate a policy which could bind the Democratic Party? This is why the committee has limited powers.

As the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] has stated, matters would come to the committee, as is done in the House, and it would act more or less as a traffic cop. The majority leader has to have some leeway, so that he can sense when the body can move and when it should move. The policy committee must be a group which will cooperate.

The point the Senator from Tennessee makes is a good one. This being true, let us broaden the base. Why should we do that? There are 10 more Democratic Senators who have come from the West. They were not Senators when the Barkley resolution was adopted. The junior Senator from Montana in the interim period has been made the whip of the Democratic Party in this body.

We have heard many arguments which, in commonsense, should be agreed with. We ought to broaden the base of the policy committee. That ought to be done tomorrow, without any argument.

Secondly, but of more importance, we ought to establish a little larger group. We can call it, not a policy committee, but a steering committee. The committee would be a Democratic representation of 65 Senators, to help in committee appointments and to help in policy matters. There would be no criticism against the majority leader or against anybody else if we broadened the base of our operation.

I understand that is what the Senator from Tennessee has been talking about today. I commend the Senator from Tennessee for a very brilliant presentation.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GRUENING and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, has the Senator from Tennessee yielded the floor?

Mr. GORE. I have.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield to me for a minute and a half?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement at this point, where it will follow the very fine speech of the junior Senator from Tennessee, as it relates to it.

There seemed to develop in the course of the colloquy this afternoon a feeling that conferences might be unwise for a number of reasons. I subscribe to the view that there are very great difficulties in having successful conferences in the Democratic Party in the Senate.

As one who championed conferences last year I want to go on record as stating that I would be satisfied if we could develop a policy committee which was representative of all Democrats, a policy committee which would meet and determine policy and which would permit all Democrats to be present when it met and when it discussed the important legislative policies at which the committee decided it would like to arrive. I think that would provide the principal objective I was trying to obtain when I championed conferences last year.

Therefore, I think there is no real or substantial difference between the position taken by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee this afternoon and the position I have consistently taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alaska yield to the Chair for a moment?

Mr. GRUENING. I am glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it should be brought to the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin that when proposed legislation is considered by the policy committee the Senators who are interested in the proposed legislation can appear before the policy committee.

Furthermore, during the past year and extending into this year there have been three additional members of the policy committee; namely, the members of the calendar committee, which is composed of the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

The Chair simply wanted to mention that fact.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator from Wisconsin is aware of that fact, and is aware of the fact that Senators are urged to appear before the committee if there is proposed legislation in which they are interested which is important in regard to policy. I am simply saying that if the policy committee became the kind of policy formulating body which it is not now but which the Senator from Tennessee suggested, and if all Senators could attend the meetings, it would serve the purpose of the caucus, in my judgment.

Mr. DIRKSEN and Mr. DOUGLAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I should be glad to yield to either Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I merely desire to have two resolutions from the House of Representatives laid before the Senate, with respect to deceased Members.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am interested in one of those resolutions, Mr. President, but I should be happy to have my colleague offer a resolution first.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CARTER, OF IOWA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (H. Res. 402), as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
January 6, 1960.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Steven V. Carter, a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 222) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Steven V. Carter, a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BUSH, OF PENNSYLVANIA

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following resolution (H. Res. 403) from the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Alvin R. Bush, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read, and for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 223) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Alvin R. Bush, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BOYLE, OF ILLINOIS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following resolution (H. Res. 401) from the House of Representatives, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable Charles A. Boyle, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read, and for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 224) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Charles A. Boyle, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

SEAWAY ROBBERY—A PLEA TO PRESIDENT EISENHOWER TO SUPPORT HIS OWN STAND AGAINST INFLATION

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, the State of Alaska is now engaged in a fateful contest, which represents yet one more battle in a perennial war which it has long fought for the life of its economy. Our opponent in this struggle is a familiar one, one with which we have contended for many years. It is the conference of steamship lines on which Alaska depends for its existence, the most powerful member of which is the Alaska Steamship Co.

Since the passage of the Jones Act in 1920 the State of Alaska has been the victim of ever increasing costs of water transportation which, while stifling the economy of the former territory, have, at the same time, resulted in benefits to the dominant carrier which, I venture to say, are unparalleled in the experience of common carriers. Under the benign management of the Federal Maritime Board and its predecessors, which passes for regulation of water carriers, the Alaska Steamship Co. has obtained one increase in its rates after another. The last, an increase of 15 percent was granted in 1958. Now, less than 2 years after receiving this tribute from the consumers of Alaska, the same carrier, from the same agency, has obtained another increase of 10 percent, which became effective yesterday. So, in this short period of time the Alaska Steamship Co. has added 26.5 percent to the burden of unduly inflated transportation costs with which Alaska has long been afflicted.

For a long time, and increasingly in recent years, the people of Alaska have been victims of what I think can only be described as seaway robbery. It is a crime in which the policeman, the Federal Maritime Board, has more often than not helped point the gun and pick the pocket.

This is not the first time the scandal of seaway robbery of Alaskans in the form of exorbitant shipping rates has been brought to the attention of the Congress. Time and time again, committees of Congress and this entire body have been told, with documentation, that shipping rates to Alaska are the highest in the world, with the least justification. Time and time again the Congress has had explanations of the manner in which this situation has continued under the supervision, and indeed, with the aid of the Federal Maritime Board and its predecessor agencies.

Once again, I call the attention of the Congress to the way in which the interest of the public has been flouted and completely disregarded by the arbitrary and capricious action of the only agency upon which Alaskans may rely for protection against unjust, unreasonable, and illegal freight rates of water carriers operating from the other States.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Did I correctly understand the distinguished Senator from Alaska to say that freight rates to Alaska have increased by 36½ percent?

Mr. GRUENING. By 26½ percent within less than 2 years.

Mr. CHURCH. And that a further 10-percent increase has been granted without benefit of a hearing?

Mr. GRUENING. Yes, without benefit of a hearing. It was granted yesterday, as I shall develop in a moment, despite the urgent plea of the Alaska delegation to withhold action until hearings could be held and the case of the people of Alaska demonstrated.

Mr. CHURCH. Does the distinguished Senator from Alaska not regard this action as highly inconsistent with the oft-stated position of the administration against inflation?

Mr. GRUENING. It is not merely inconsistent; it is absolutely contradictory; and, as I shall develop, it goes directly counter to the words which the President uttered in his state of the Union message. Almost simultaneously with the fine references to his policy to fight inflation as one would fight a fire in one's home, that policy was being violated by one of the executive agencies, all of whose members were appointed by the President.

Mr. CHURCH. Does the Senator not agree that that is another flagrant example of the way this administration has been combating inflation with pious platitudes?

Mr. GRUENING. It is a perfect illustration of that contradiction.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator. I think he is rendering a great service to the people of Alaska by bringing this question to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GRUENING. I hope it is a service not only to the people of Alaska, but to the people of our entire Nation. I think it is highly important that we see the great disparity between the fine words which are uttered on high and the actions which are so completely contrary to the noble sentiments expressed.

In accordance with the law and procedures of the Federal Maritime Board the State of Alaska petitioned the Board that a hearing be held upon the issue of the proposed rate increase and that the 10-percent increase be suspended and not allowed to go into effect pending such a hearing and a final order of the Board. The petition cited, at length, the old familiar facts of monopolistic shipping practices of the carrier, the outrageously high price of shipping to Alaska, the need of Alaska for relief from such an intolerable burden, and the fact that the carrier would suffer no damage and would, in fact, retain its presently high earnings if the rates were not increased at all. It pointed out that the basis upon which the carrier has asked for this increase is unrealistic, cannot be substantiated, and is not an accurate reflection of the economics of the case. It pointed out that, contrary to the representations of the carrier, it can expect, as its current rates, not a decline in earnings in the coming year in Alaska, but, instead, a substantial increase in profits after taxes. In brief, the State made such a case it could under the circumstances, to show that the rate increase must be suspended at least until such time as the carrier would be required to come before the Board in public hearing and justify its position.

I remind the Senate that, at this stage of the proceeding, the State is limited to the most meager information concerning the financial status of the carrier. It does not have available the invaluable weapons of interrogation, of discovery, and of cross-examination which can be obtained only with the machinery of a public hearing under established rules of procedure.

As for the Federal Maritime Board, it has before it the bare statement of the carrier that it must add another 10 percent to its already astronomical rates. There has been no hearing, no examination of evidence, no interrogation and cross-examination of witnesses. In short, no process of factfinding at all.

And yet, without having had a hearing, without having given the State of Alaska, which is the most important party in interest in this matter, an opportunity to present its case, the Federal Maritime Board has issued an order by which it refuses to suspend the rate increase.

It has granted a hearing, yes. But to the people of Alaska this is small comfort. In fact, it is a farce. Even should the 10-percent increase be found excessive as a result of the hearing, the people of Alaska are faced with an immediate and unjustified addition to the already scandalously high cost of living in the 49th State. Had the increase in rates been suspended for the 120-day period for which provision is made in the law, the people of the State of Alaska would have, at least, been saved from its inflationary effects for that length of time. They would have had an opportunity to put the Alaska Steamship Co. to its proof of the need for an increase. They would have had an opportunity to present their case and to challenge that of the carrier.

But this was not allowed Alaska.

Rather, the Board has already allowed the increased rate to go into effect.

In effect, the State of Alaska has lost this case.

Immediately, prices for commodities sold in Alaska will increase and the increase will come from the pockets of every member of the community. There is no way this can be recovered. The prices will not go down if the rate increase is disapproved, after hearing, in whole or in part. There may be a windfall to the shippers if the rate increase is not approved. But there is no possible way in which the citizens of Alaska, the consumers of Alaska, can recover.

They are in the position of one who has been made to serve a sentence in jail; and, even if later found innocent, have already served their time. Except, for Alaska, there is really no end to the effects of this failure to suspend the rates. The increased costs to the shippers occasioned by the higher rates will simply be passed on to the merchants who will pass them on to the consumer, with inevitable snowballing all along the way. The tragedy of this is that the individual Alaska consumer, on whom the full burden falls, has had no opportunity whatever to protest or to avoid effectively the consequences of the action of the Federal Maritime Board.

There is another aspect of this freight rate increase which is particularly unfortunate, distressing, and ironic. All of us listened attentively last Thursday in the Chamber of the other body when the President of the United States in his address on the state of the Union solicited our cooperation in the struggle to prevent inflation. To quote the President, "We must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home."

At that very moment, before the echoes of the President's words were stilled, one of the agencies of his administration was busy pouring fuel on the fire of inflation. The Federal Maritime Board, every member of which was appointed by this administration, was taking the most inflationary of actions and doing so without even looking at the evidence.

The President of the United States on Thursday described the inflation as "an opponent of so many guises that it is sometimes difficult to recognize." There is no difficulty involved in recognizing the direct inflationary effects of a general 10-percent increase on top of a 15-percent increase less than 2 years ago, in shipping costs to an area like Alaska which depends for its existence on ocean transportation.

Mr. President, if the State where this large increase fell were California, or Texas, or Massachusetts, there would be alternatives by which the citizens could in some measure adjust their operations so as to lessen its consequences. They could turn to other means of transportation. They could ship by railroad, or by motortruck. But in Alaska, except to a degree and to a limited area which make their effect immaterial, these means of transportation are nonexistent. Every man, woman, and child in Alaska depends on water transportation to a degree which is unknown in any other State except Hawaii. When water transportation rates go up, the cost of living goes up, immediately and for everyone.

The action of the Federal Maritime Board in permitting this 10-percent increase in Alaska freight rates to go into effect without a hearing is the most inflationary action which has been perpetrated in my part of the United States in the past year. In the preceding 12 months, the most inflationary action affecting Alaskans was the 15-percent freight rate increase of 1958. Both of these calamities were permitted, presided over, and even endorsed by a board appointed by the same President Eisenhower who has so often urged the rest of us to fight inflation. The President's fine sounding words will have a hollow ring throughout the 49th State whose entry into the Union in the very same message the President both hailed and saluted as one of our two new western stars. We wish his administration's actions would correspond with his fine words. Certainly the way in which the 10-percent increase which became effective yesterday was permitted without the necessity of any proof of need amounted to an open invitation to the carriers to do it again—and do it any time you like.

To demonstrate the effects of this action somewhat more graphically, let me tell you what this will mean in dollars and cents to Alaska, and to the steamship company.

Based on the company's own estimated projection of its 1960 revenues, the allowance of this 10-percent increase will result in an increase in its revenues of more than $1,600,000 this year. The State of Alaska, finding that the basis upon which the company's estimate is unrealistic, estimates that this increase to the company will amount to nearly $1,900,000. This increase, in conjunction with the 15-percent increase previously allowed, places a burden of some $4 million annually on the people of Alaska.

It fairly staggers the imagination, to say nothing of one's sense of justice and democratic government to think that this intolerable tax for the benefit of the Alaska Steamship Co. was imposed upon the people of Alaska by a Federal agency without their having had the slightest opportunity to protest effectively. I say here that the Federal Maritime Board has acted in this instance without any regard whatever for the public interest. It has acted arbitrarily, capriciously, and with a cavalier disregard of the dismaying results of its action which is shocking.

I wish to emphasize that the law provides for suspension of such a rate increase for a maximum period of 120 days. The Federal Maritime Board could, in its discretion, have taken the action which I believe to be wise and proper, and could have suspended this increase long enough for the people of Alaska to make their case. It refused to do this when specifically requested to do so in the public interest.

It occurs to me that the reasons for such procedures and such decisions by this agency constitute a fitting subject for congressional investigation. The action of the Board was, to be sure, in accord with the procedures permitted by law. The aspect of the matter that is most troublesome is that, having the discretion to act in the public interest by suspending the rates, the Board instead acted only for the benefit of the Alaska Steamship Co. There is, at this time, no way of determining the mechanics by which such action was taken. But I think we can all agree that the Congress cannot look with equanimity upon the spectacle of a public body, which ought to act in the interest of the public, taking action which favors only the interests of a steamship company, an action which it has taken again and again.

Now, had there been some overriding reason for the failure to suspend the rate increase, this action could be explained. But in this case there is none.

This is not the case of a poor, struggling company which, in the interests of the public, should be saved from starvation or bankruptcy. The Alaska Steamship Co. is not losing money. Quite the contrary.

According to the statement of the company itself it was not losing money in 1959. In fact, its own statement of profits after taxes, partially on a projected basis, shows that in 1959 it earned profits of some $99,617.

The company bases its need for an increase in rates on increases in costs which would cause losses if—and this is the most serious fallacy in its calculations—tonnage carried by the company in 1960 is at the same level as tonnage carried in 1959. Such a projection is without meaning.

As it happens, the year of 1959 was marred, in Alaska, by the occurrence of a prolonged carpenters' strike, which continued from June until September—the prime construction and business season in Alaska. Its effects there were more pervasive, and devasting, than were those of the recent steel strike on the Nation. Construction in Alaska, a major factor in the economy, was almost completely halted, thus depressing severely the economy of the State, and, consequently, diminishing the amount of tonnage carried to Alaska by the Alaska Steamship Co.

But, even in 1959, taking into account the depressed conditions flowing from the carpenters' strike, the Alaska Steamship Co. made money.

And in 1960 there is no likelihood whatever of the conditions which prevailed in 1959. In fact, all estimates for economic growth and development in 1960 indicate a more prosperous year by far than 1959. This will, inevitably, result in an increase in tonnage carried by the Alaska Steamship Co., consequently an increase in its revenues despite rising costs.

However, we Alaskans do not want to prejudge the case. It may be that the increases will be found on examination to be justified. Certainly, if a way to justify them can be found, we may count on the Federal Maritime Board to do so. My remarks today go to another issue. It is the issue of rendering of a verdict before the evidence has been heard. Of this the regulatory agency in this instance is guilty.

The Federal Maritime Board has said, in answer to protests over its failure to suspend this rate increase, that its primary consideration in this action was the welfare of the carrier.

Mr. President, I submit that the welfare of the carrier has had quite enough attention. It is now time to give attention to the welfare of the public, something which this administration seldom does.

So that the President may not be wholly unaware of what is going on in his administration, the Alaska delegation to Congress, Senator BARTLETT, Congressman RIVERS, and myself have sent him the following telegram:

January 9, 1960.

Hon. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

We are profoundly shocked that even as you delivered your state of the Union message, which included an urgent plea that "We must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home," the Federal Maritime Board, constituted wholly of appointees of your administration, has just poured gasoline on the fires of inflation, not merely imperiling but beginning to consume the homes of all Alaskans. The Board has granted a 10 percent increase in water freight rates immediately effective without a prior hearing requested by the State government of Alaska, its congressional delegation, and virtually every public body in the State, although the Board is permitted by law to suspend such increases for 120 days.

The burden which runs into several millions of dollars falls not only on the homes of Alaskans but also on the Federal Government which is likewise an important shipper. The implications of the Board's action are known to it because they were explicitly explained to it as late as Friday afternoon by the entire Alaska congressional delegation. It is wholly pertinent that in this very same message, where you so dramatically urged the fight on inflation, you also said: "Neither we nor any other free-world nation can permit ourselves to be misled by pleasant promises until they are tested by performance." We call upon you, therefore, respectfully to back up your words on inflation by performance and to request the Federal Maritime Board to rescind its order and suspend the rate increases ordered as of tomorrow, January 10—for the 120-day period permitted it by law and give Alaska an opportunity to present its case before being convicted and our whole economy drastically penalized by the fires of inflation.

ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senator.
E. L. BARTLETT,
U.S. Senator.
RALPH J. RIVERS,
Member of Congress.

Mr. President, I think it will be interesting for the American public to see whether the President is willing, in view of his repeated and vigorous declarations against inflation, to join us in fighting the contemporaneous conflagration which imperils our homes.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I congratulate the Senator from Alaska for an argument and presentation to which I believe there can be no successful rebuttal. I believe his logic is unassailable. As one who supported statehood for Alaska for a number of years, the junior Senator from Louisiana became convinced that the problems were so great and so varied, and the injustices to Alaskans so many in number, that it would be absolutely impossible ever to have these matters straightened out, with justice and fairness to all, unless Alaska was represented in the United States Congress by members who would fight for Alaska and point out the injustices which were being done.

I congratulate the Senator from Alaska, not only for the work he is doing here today, but also for the work he has done in the past in writing books and articles and making speeches, explaining the great number of instances in which there has been unfair discrimination against Alaskans, contrary to the will of the great majority of the American people.

Mr. GRUENING. I thank the distinguished and able Senator from Louisiana, who has been helpful to us for many years in our fight to achieve equality. I appreciate his support this afternoon.

I point out to him what will be increasingly evident as the story of Alaska unfolds: That although Congress has granted Alaska statehood, and we have equality on paper, the economic consequences of 90 years of colonialism are still with us. This is a striking example. The same carrier which was given special privileges and a monopoly by congressional action 40 years ago still persists, to the detriment of Alaska, in seeking to extend its monopoly.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If I might offer a prediction, I believe that if Alaska continues to get the kind of able representation it has been receiving in Congress since it became a State, it will not take a great number of years to correct most of those practices.

Mr. GRUENING. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I commend the Senator from Alaska for his remarks on the floor today. I, too, have felt the effects of discriminatory freight rates. I well remember that in 1934, when I was elected Governor of South Carolina, I found to my utter disgust that the freight rates imposed against what was known as the South—anywhere below the Mason-Dixon line—were from 35 to 40 percent higher than the freight rates paid in the other areas of the United States. I found that to ship a box of shoes from Boston, Mass., to South Carolina cost from 35 to 40 percent more than to ship the same box of shoes from Boston to any other part of the country.

The Governors of the Southern States, at my suggestion, held a conference and began to work on the matter of freight rates. The result was a saving to the South of hundreds of millions of dollars in freight rates. That conference caused a saving of that much in freight rates.

The Senator from Alaska is to be commended for what he is doing, at the first sign of a move to increase freight rates on shipments to Alaska without a proper hearing being afforded before the courts.

Mr. GRUENING. I thank the Senator from South Carolina. I congratulate him on his leadership in freeing the South from the burdensome and unjust freight rates which had been imposed on that region of the country.

But I call his attention to the fact that, in addition to the extortionate maritime rates, a precisely similar situation exists with respect to rail rates. It may be of interest to the Senator from South Carolina to know, and for the Senate as a whole to know, that we in Alaska are charged more for the shipment of an article destined for Alaska over the same railroad than if the identical article is sent to any other place bordering on the Pacific. For instance, if a refrigerator is bought in Detroit and is destined for Fairbanks or any other city in Alaska, the freight rates on that article from Detroit are much higher than if the identical article were tagged for some place in Japan, Australia, the west coast of South America, or almost any other place in the Pacific. That is due to the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission, against which we have to date protested in vain. But we will continue our fight, stimulated by the experience of which the Senator from South Carolina has spoken concerning the fight by the South against similar unjust practices.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I commend the distinguished Senator from Alaska upon his splendid speech. I have had the opportunity to study and read it as well as to hear a large part of it.

I think the Senator is eminently correct. There may be some kind of case for a 15-percent sales tax—that is what this really is—although I doubt it. It is a tax on virtually everything which Alaskans have to buy. All of us are proud of Alaska. We are proud that it is now a State. There is no question in the mind of anyone that as a State Alaska offers richer potential resources for development than any other part of the United States of America. Whether those resources will be developed or not depends to a very great extent on whether they can be made commercially attractive today. The great penalty and the great problem which the two Senators from Alaska understand so well is the very serious substantial transportation cost.

When the Federal Government raises freight rates, as the Senator from Alaska says, within a very few hours of the time when the President made his strong speech against inflation, and imposes a 15-percent addition on the cost of the transportation of freight shipped to Alaska, there is no question that such action should be protested vigorously.

I think the Senator from Alaska deserves great credit for what he is doing.

Mr. GRUENING. We greatly appreciate the support of the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to ask him whether, in view of the fact that within 2 years the freight rates have been increased by 26½ percent, he knows of any other situation, anywhere under the flag, which justifies an increase of that proportion.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I certainly do not.

I think the last point which the Senator from Alaska made, namely, that it costs more to ship freight to Alaska than to any other point on the Pacific, points which are farther away, points which are not under the American flag, is a most telling point, one which is most shocking.

Above all, to put this increase into effect without a hearing is something which I simply cannot understand.

Mr. GRUENING. I call attention to the fact that the higher rates, the exorbitant rates, charged by the maritime cargo carrier, are particularly flagrant in that, as I pointed out in the colloquy with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], they are higher—sometimes as much as 140 percent higher—than the rates charged for precisely the same services involving the same type of articles shipped elsewhere in the United States.

It is hard to believe that if an Alaskan wishes to buy a certain article and if the shipping tag on the article shows that it is destined for Alaska, he has to pay up to 140 percent more, in certain cases, for shipping the article to Alaska, whereas if the article is marked for shipment to Australia or any other area in the Pacific, including even Communist China, if the article could go there, a lower rate is available.

That situation is protested by the General Services Administration, which is interested in saving the Government money.

Thus it is that the people of Alaska are confronted with a terrible dilemma.

Let me say that I greatly appreciate the support of the Senator from Wisconsin and the support of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should like to say, in conclusion, that in effect, the Maritime Board is imposing a tax on the people of Alaska. Actually, it is a rate increase; but in effect it is a discriminatory tax increase. It is most unfair; and I think the Senator from Alaska is eminently correct in protesting it as vigorously as he has.

Mr. GRUENING. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I desire to speak on the subject which has so properly engaged the attention of my colleague from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING]. I join the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] in commending my colleague [Mr. GRUENING] for his speech, which very much needed to be made.

Mr. President, this is a story which I very much regret to have to tell in sequel to the remarks already made by my colleague from Alaska. It is a story about inflation. It is a story about administrative procedure in which the voice of the public has been stilled.

On December 10, 1959, the members of the Pacific Coast-Alaska Freight Conference, which operate as carriers by water between Pacific coast ports and Alaska, filed tariff supplements with the Federal Maritime Board. The tariff supplements called for a general freight rate increase of 10 percent in the Alaska trade. The carriers published the new schedules to become effective on January 10, 1960, 30 days after filing.

Responsible Alaskans expressed concern. Dedicated to the development of an area whose economic progress is vital to the well-being of our Nation, Alaskans saw in the proposed freight-rate increase a new threat to our efforts to check inflation and to promote the growth of the 49th State.

But the concern in Alaska, Mr. President, was not tantamount to panic. We Alaskans anticipated an adversary proceeding under the practices and procedures of the Federal Maritime Board. Governor Eagan, of Alaska, directed Alaska's attorney general, John Rader, to fly here to the Nation's Capital, and to act appropriately to protect the public interest. The resources of the people of Alaska were ready to be marshaled in the anti-inflation cause. Responsible Alaskans did not prejudge the rate demands of the carriers; but responsible Alaskans did look forward to a quasi-judicial proceeding in which these demands could be assessed after a hearing of all interested parties and after the presentation of evidence. To be sure, we were puzzled to note that the carriers predicted a 1960 freight volume no greater than the volume in the year just ended. As residents of a growing area of America, we realized that 1959 was an abnormally poor year in the history of the Alaska economy. Our construction was brought virtually to a standstill by a labor-management dispute. Our salmon pack reached a low point in its cycle. In fact, the salmon pack was the smallest on record. There was general agreement that the economic prospects for 1960 were bright. Some Alaskans, too, challenge the method by which the carriers calculated their rate base. But Alaskans anticipated that the reasonableness of the carriers' computations of their volume and of their rate base would be the subject of an impartial hearing before the Federal Maritime Board.

The expectations of the Alaska people followed reasonably from the previous practices of the Board on matters affecting the Alaska trade. We recalled, for example, that as recently as 1958, these carriers sought and obtained a 15-percent freight-rate increase. We remembered that the 1958 increase was granted after a hearing, and that no increase was imposed until the hearing was completed. With confidence in our State administration and the abilities of State experts, we looked ahead to the 1960 hearings in the belief that the interests of the Alaska consumers would be represented adequately and that the hearings would be fair to the people and fair to the carriers. Fairness to all concerned was our desire.

Moreover, Mr. President, the people of Alaska were heartened by the decision of the General Services Administration to participate as an ally of the State of Alaska in challenging the proposed new rate schedule. The General Services Administration agreed with us—who called upon the agency to participate—that the Government of the United States, as the principal shipper of goods to Alaska, has an important stake in the prevention of increased freight costs. All Americans are alerted to the dangers of inflation. We may as practical men disagree about some of the causes of inflation; but no one can dispute the fact that a 10-percent freight-rate increase will raise the cost of living and doing business in Alaska, not only for Alaskans, but for American taxpayers everywhere.

Mr. President, on January 5, the Alaska Senators and Representative sent a telegram to the Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board. Our telegram called for suspension of the proposed rate increase until full hearings could determine the reasonableness of the proposed new tariff. We warned that "The interests of the people of Alaska cannot be adequately protected in any other manner." Our request was consistent with the Board's previous procedure in its regulation of the Alaskan trade. Our request was consistent with the law and the regulations. Our request was consistent with commonsense concepts of fairplay.

I wish that I could advise the Senate, the President, and the people that our expectations were fulfilled and that our warning was heeded. Instead, I must report that the Board, on January 7, ordered the new rates to become effective on January 10, and directing an investigation of them sometime in the future.

So the new year begins with still more inflationary pressure upon the Federal budget, and, in particular, upon the Alaska householder, housewife, and businessman who suffered, only 2 years ago, at the instance of these carriers, a 15-percent rate increase.

The cost of moving goods by water to or from Alaska, then, has risen over 25 percent in 2 years. The people of Alaska are asked to absorb these increases without even having an opportunity to challenge their essentiality.

Mr. President, the imposition of the latest increase made a sad anniversary for my State, which on other counts might review its first year of statehood with satisfaction. Alaska has been handed an anniversary present it does not want, and cannot protest—an anniversary present whose effects cannot be undone.

Mr. President, I can hear already the contention that should the Board's future investigations prove the new tariff to be unwarranted, the Board will require the carriers to make refunds to the shippers of the money paid to meet the higher rates. But, who, Mr. President, makes refunds to the housewife? Who keeps records to make whole the consumer in Alaska?

For such a procedure and such a ruling as the Board has issued, there ought to be some justification. Here is a procedure that allows a challenge of the higher rates only after they are imposed. Here is a procedure that promotes the inflation which all Americans are committed to resist. Here is a procedure that discourages the development of an area strategic in location, vital in its natural and human resources.

Mr. President, the Alaska delegation to Congress met with the three members of the Federal Maritime Board on Friday afternoon last. We expressed our shock and dismay. We called for justification.

Justification No. 1 was that the practice of allowing rate increases prior to hearings, even in situations in which challengers assert a public interest against the increase, is followed in other administrative agencies. Such an argument deserves little comment except to say that it indicates with what frequency the regulators—or some of them—are seeing the interests of the public and the interests of the regulated through the wrong end of the telescope.

Justification No. 2 was that the carriers in the Alaska trade are in such dire condition that to continue to perform until May 10, 1960, under the old schedule would be disastrous for the trade. May 10, of course, is the latest date, under the regulations, to which the Board could have suspended the imposition of the new tariff.

This conclusion, Mr. President, is unsupportable, unless the carriers have been so irresponsible, so imprudent, and so heedless of the public interest and the interest of their stockholders, that they have waited until the eleventh hour to file new tariffs to save themselves from economic disaster.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I will not impose at any length on the time of the Senate, but I have been listening to the able addresses by both the senior Senator from Alaska and the junior Senator from Alaska.

It was my privilege and opportunity to serve in Alaska during much of World War II and to have visited Alaska on many occasions thereafter. If my recollection serves me correctly, very often when one asked why the price of so many necessities of life, such as food, lodging, medical services, and other essentials, was so grievously high in Alaska, almost invariably he would be told, "It's the freight rates." The distinguished Senators from Alaska have heard that comment on many more occasions than I have.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is a common phrase used in Alaska.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Now there is to be a further justification for this phrase, to the extent of 25 percent.

It seems to me if this great frontier, which has just been granted statehood, is to prosper, something is going to have to be done about increased freight rates. Evidently this administration has decided that that something is for freight rates to go still higher.

I join my colleagues from Alaska in protesting against these ever-increasing freight rates and I shall be happy to join with them in any action which they think might possibly bring about a diminution of spiraling freight rates which can only make it more difficult for industry and business to succeed in Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank my friend, the Senator from Oregon. I would say that there is something the Federal Maritime Board might do, instead of acceding, almost automatically, to every request for freight increase made by the carriers serving, if you please, not only Alaska, but Hawaii and Puerto Rico. Puerto Rico is the most comparable situation to that which we have in Alaska.

I would say it is the duty of the Federal Maritime Board to evolve a plan for presentation to the Congress to take care of a shipping situation which differs so radically from that which we find in the foreign trade and that which we find in the intracoastal and intercoastal trade. But, to the best of my belief and knowledge, the Federal Maritime Board has given no consideration at all to solving this vexing and very real problem. Instead, it appears that the Federal Maritime Board is content to sit in its offices downtown and merely approve whatever rate increases are asked for by the carriers, whenever they are requested. The time has come, in my considered opinion, when this procedure will no longer do.

The people of Alaska cannot survive economically forever in a situation of this kind, which, in 2 years, has seen a freight rate increase of 25 percent. How is it expected that an economy can maintain its own, much less develop, under that sort of accelerated increase?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have some constituents in Oregon who are investing some of their capital, if I am not mistaken, in developing a sawmill and related forest industry in Wrangell.

Mr. BARTLETT. They are. We welcome them. They are doing a good job.

Mr. NEUBERGER. They are doing an excellent job. Increases in freight rates make it more difficult for those who invest their capital there to compete with the forest products industry elsewhere. Is that not correct?

Mr. BARTLETT. That statement follows as a matter of course. Alaska is a State of great and many natural resources. From Alaska we obtain some raw materials fractional in amount compared with those available for use for the benefit of the Nation. But if production costs—and freight rates constitute a very considerable segment—continue to mount faster than they do else where, it is obvious we cannot expect to have new mines, new sawmills, new pulp mills. We will have to forget that to which we looked forward so confidently—an era immediately ahead of us of expanding economic growth. That era can still come if the Federal Government will see to it that freight rates are not exorbitant, and the Federal Maritime Board, as apparently is the case now, does not make every possible contribution toward an increase in those rates.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I conclude by emphasizing again that I wish to join with the Senators from Alaska in such action as they recommend in trying to remove from around the neck of Alaska this albatross of ever-increasing maritime freight rates.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I had noted a belief that it is scarcely likely the steamship companies did not know, before the date they filed tariffs for higher rates, that they might require increases. My view, rather, is that the carriers were prepared for a suspension of rates, in accordance with the Board's own precedents, and that they had planned far ahead of the present time. My view is based on what we are entitled to expect from management in a great industry. I note, too, that the leading carrier predicted a loss of $228,000 in 1960 if the new rates were not imposed. Even assuming that the loss for the first 120 days of 1960 would be one-third of this 1960 loss figure, and even assuming the accuracy of the loss figure itself, it is clear—by the computations of this carrier—that suspension of the rates for not longer than 4 months would have worked no irreparable hardship upon the industry. The procedure adopted, however, does cause irreparable harm to every Alaskan.

At the conference held on Friday between my colleague from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], Representative RIVERS, and myself on the one side and the members of the Federal Maritime Board on the other side, we invited the members of the Board to reconsider their decision and to suspend the imposition of the new tariffs until all of the facts could be heard. We were promised careful consideration and review of the matter. The Board members parted from us upon that assurance. Within minutes, Mr. President, a telephone message was left for us advising that the Board would adhere to the order of January 7.

Our request was rejected. As a matter of fact, I should note that this is only a rumor so far as I am concerned, to date, but it is a rumor which comes from a good source. The telephone call was made to the office of my colleague from Alaska. The members of the board did not have the courtesy to call me.

The promise of careful consideration and review was nothing more, clearly, than a retreat from an indignant Alaska public. The careful consideration and review—at most—became a quick nose count in a taxicab between the Senate Office Building and Maritime Board headquarters.

So, Mr. President, the first phase of the story has ended. The losers are the Alaska consumers, the American taxpayers, the soundness of administrative process, and, I might add, the justice of administrative process.

Let us resolve that in the second phase of this story we shall scrutinize the personnel, the practices, the procedures, and the policies of these agencies so that the public interest will be paramount, as it ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. BENNETT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNAMARA in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina.

THE EISENHOWER ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, at a later date I intend to present for the RECORD the speech President Eisenhower made in Columbia, S.C., when he was running for the office of President of the United States. The speech he made there will show why I am making these few remarks at the present time.

Mr. President, the state of the Union message delivered by the President of the United States last week was a masterful political speech which leaves no doubt that although Mr. Eisenhower is President, he is also still general.

He was generally misleading. He generously dealt in generalities and he generally left out half the facts about nearly every general subject he spoke upon. I must say, however, his address was much clearer than some of his press conferences.

When the President spoke about the $290 billion debt, I could not help but think of the $30 billion that have been added to the national debt since Eisenhower became President. He did not say anything about that.

And I could not help but remember his campaign speeches of 1952 when he attacked the Democratic administration of that day for not having reduced the national debt, ignoring the fact that we had just finished a world war and were in the midst of fighting another war in Korea.

In 1952 the President promised to halt inflation, to reduce the national debt, to eliminate farm surpluses, and to maintain 90 to 100 percent of parity. He also promised to keep our defenses strong, and he promised practically everything else necessary to capture votes.

What is his record? In two terms he has failed completely not only to halt inflation, but even to do anything to try to stop it. He increased the national debt in each of the 7 years he has held office, and during this period has promoted other inflationary policies such as huge nonmilitary oversea spending and high interest rates. Mr. Eisenhower's administration has raised the national debt approximately $30 billion since it has been in office.

His tight money policies accompanied by high interest rates on all Government loans, both as lender and borrower, have resulted in runaway inflation. In his speech of general terms the President said he wanted a "freer hand" in debt management.

He spoke, as usual, in general terms. But what the President wants to do specifically, as we all know, is to increase interest rates even higher, thereby spiraling the cost of debt management higher, thus hiking the national debt. All this would be at the cost of the taxpayer, with the benefit reaped by the moneylenders.

Interest rates under Eisenhower's administration in many areas have more than doubled since he took office. If he succeeds in getting his "freer hand" in debt management, I predict interest rates will go higher and inflation will run away with some more of the public's pocketbook before he leaves office.

I am afraid the big economic boom for 1960 that economists are talking about will be confined to inflation and interest rates, and will not include take-home pay for working people if Eisenhower has his way this year on fiscal matters as he has had for the past 7 years.

The administration's handling of farm problems has not varied during its 7 years in office. The President has been a rubberstamp for Mr. Benson, who has promoted programs which have done nothing for the farmers except to lower their net income and to raise their debts. Instead of keeping his promise to maintain high parity, the President bowed on every occasion to Mr. Benson's various jack-leg farm proposals. In doing so, the President knocked the props out from under nearly every program in the books. This shotgun approach to farm problems succeeded in skyrocketing the amounts of surpluses in Government warehouses and the costs of maintaining them.

While he has reduced parity to the lowest possible point on every basic farm program in existence except tobacco, which he could not touch because of the way the law was written, he has allowed the Secretary of Agriculture to maintain the parity for wool at roughly 110 percent throughout his tenure of office. Of course, the people grow wool out where Mr. Benson comes from.

Moreover, the administration closed warehouses in many parts of the country that were storing food surpluses at reasonable prices and shifted the storage to more costly warehouses. Storage costs have skyrocketed under Mr. Benson. Under Eisenhower's farm programs the cost of all farm programs to the Government, including salaries, storage of surpluses, giveaway programs, and everything else amounted to more than $7 billion in 1959 alone.

Under President Truman, in 1951, the last year before he left office, all these farm programs cost less than $700 million, or only one-tenth of what they cost under Benson and Eisenhower last year.

In all of Mr. Truman's administration, all farm programs cost approximately $14 billion, while under Alibi Ike's administration the farm programs have cost roughly $40 billion. At least under Mr. Truman's administration the farmer was getting 90 percent of parity for his products and could pay his taxes and bills and feed his family. Under Ike the farmers cannot even hold onto their land, much less make a living. Farm incomes have, and still are, steadily dropping, while costs of operation continue to rise, along with what the housewife has to pay for what the farmer grows. I, for one, want no more of the so-called realistic approaches to the farm problems that Eisenhower spoke of in his address on the state of the Union.

His economies are a big farce. His military glitter is not much better than sequins sprinkled on gummy paper, and his budgeting program is about as sound as a hollow log.

The President's boastings concerning our military missile accomplishments are about as astonishing to responsible thinking people who know the facts as will be the firing of an atomic bomb by France or the invention of a submachine gun by lower Slobovia. It is good that we have developed what we have, but it is a tragedy in our history the way we lag.

I have nothing personal against the President of the United States. I recognize the fact that his job is a most difficult one to perform. But I cannot sit complacently by and let Mr. Eisenhower's high-fidelity speeches send us all into a dream world while the realities of life go by.

It is impossible for me to be as optimistic about the future on every score as the President, and I refuse to accept his state of the Union message as any realistic picture of our situation in the world today. For the welfare of our Nation I hope the President himself knows all the facts that he left out of his half-factual state of the Union message.

Mr. President, there is one final thought that I would like to get over. The President predicts that in 1961 the Nation will have a surplus of more than $4 billion in the Treasury.

In making up this surplus, he will reduce no wartime taxes. He will also ask for additional taxes, in order to produce a surplus. I doubt whether the Congress will grant them. Very likely a request for supplemental appropriations will be made in a very few months, amounting to probably $1 or $2 billion.

The same thing will be true in 1961. I ask Senators to watch that prediction, and see if it is not borne out.

There will be an election between now and 1961, and I presume that there will be a partisan Republican like Mr. Eisenhower running for presidential office this fall. To predict this surplus on paper is good politics, but before we count our chickens, let us wait for the old eggs to hatch.

If President Eisenhower succeeds in raising the interest rates on money borrowed by this country and fails to do anything to halt inflation, I fear that the surplus of eggs he has glowingly predicted will hatch to be nothing but higher debt ceilings, bigger national debts and similar creatures he has been laying and hatching for us for the past 7 years.

The total interest paid today on money borrowed by this country is approximately $9½ billion. The amount of interest paid has been approximately doubled since Mr. Eisenhower has been in office.

Again I say that I do not share the President's delight over his record of the past 7 years nor his optimistic glowing over the future of his last year in office.

SPECIAL SENATE SHOWING OF THE MOTION PICTURE "ON THE BEACH"

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I know it is impertinent for a Republican to comment on the matter which has occupied the attention of many of my colleagues this afternoon, the question of Democratic policy meetings. However, I should like to suggest, after sitting here for most of the afternoon, that I am in favor of more of them, because if they are held during the session of the Senate, there will be time for a Republican to be recognized before a quarter to 6 in the evening.

The failure to get timely recognition bothers me a little tonight, because the subject on which I wish to speak had a kind of deadline at 5 o'clock.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum, because his remarks may be very important.

Mr. BENNETT. I hope the Senator from Alaska will not go through with that suggestion, because the effect of it would be to delay me another 20 minutes before I would have an opportunity to make the remarks I should like to make.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] had thoughtfully arranged for a special showing today at 5 p.m. of the motion picture "On the Beach," for Senators and members of their staffs. I hope that many Members of the Senate were able to take advantage of this opportunity to view a motion picture which is both interesting and thought provoking.

However, I should like to sound a note of warning. I think this film could do a great deal of harm. In my opinion it paints a distorted picture of what a nuclear war would probably be like, and I believe it is important that those who see it should accept it for what it is—an imaginative piece of science fiction, a fantasy, and not a dramatization of what would probably happen in the event of nuclear war.

Let me make two things crystal clear at this point.

First, I do not minimize the wholesale destruction which is implicit in an all-out nuclear attack. The loss of life and property would far surpass anything the world has ever seen, and the prevention of such a holocaust is the biggest job facing the diplomats of the world today.

Second, I do not criticize the motion picture on dramatic or esthetic grounds, and I do not challenge the right of the author to create any fictional situation, however unrealistic it might be, for dramatic purposes. But I think it should be made clear that the situation, as well as the plot, is fictional.

As most Senators know, the situation involves the contamination of the atmosphere by radioactivity, which engulfs the earth over a period of months, wiping out all human life.

In fairness to the author of "On the Beach," Mr. Neville Shute, let me say at this point that I believe the novel made it clear that this situation did not result from the kind of nuclear war which might be fought with existing nuclear weapons, but that it could result from what we might call a technological breakthrough, which made it possible for cheap atomic bombs to be made by the thousands, so that even the tiniest countries had large supplies, including bombs of far greater radioactivity than those we now have.

The picture does not make this point clear. It creates the impression that a major nuclear war, if there should be one in the near future, would be the sort depicted. It does not go into the "ifs, ands, and buts" which are prerequisite to that situation.

To take this kind of motion picture literally is to invite catastrophe. If we assume, as the picture does, that civil defense measures are completely worthless, as they would be in the fictional situation of "On the Beach," we will make no effort to take cover, to protect ourselves from fallout, to resist the attack as best we can. And if an enemy knows we have that attitude, he will be that much more likely to attack.

In some respects, this situation is reminiscent of the "Invasion From Mars" staged by Orson Welles two decades ago. In that case, as in this, a conceivable but highly unlikely situation was accepted as fact by many Americans. In that case, however, the error was easily corrected; in this case, it is very difficult to set the record straight.

Let me reiterate that I am not saying that nuclear war is as remote a possibility as an invasion from Mars. I am saying only that the kind of nuclear war contemplated in the movie, with a 5- to 20-year blanket of lethal fallout all over the globe, is at present in the realm of fantasy.

This is not merely a personal opinion. As a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, I have sat through many hearings on radioactive fallout, and just this morning I consulted with several radiation experts from the Atomic Energy Commission on this subject. I think there is no question about the premise of the movie being unrealistic.

God forbid that we shall ever witness the use of nuclear weapons in international conflict. But if, despite our best efforts, we should become involved in that kind of catastrophe, I hope—and I believe—that the human race will retain the will to live, the innate courage which keeps us going against seemingly insurmountable odds.

The black death, which took the lives of one-fourth of the people of Europe in the 14th Century, must have been just as frightening at that time as nuclear war is today—and it was just as deadly. The 25 percent of the population it killed compares roughly with the 30 percent we would probably lose in a heavy nuclear attack, if no one took cover. But unlike the medieval Europeans, we have the knowledge to reduce that 30 percent figure to 3 percent by taking proper precautions. And this, of course, is assuming the worst. Our real hope lies in finding some way to assure that there will never be a nuclear war.

So I hope that some of those who see this movie today will keep in mind that it is science fiction, and that the situation it assumes is not to be taken as one based on scientific fact.

The science in it is just as fictitious as its characters. Unless the picture is viewed against this background, it can only result in confusion, misunderstanding, and perhaps unjustified resignation to a seemingly inevitable doom.

Mr. President, I have just been handed a note which indicates that the picture which was shown at 5 o'clock, in the auditorium of the New Senate Office Building, will be shown again at 7:30 tonight. I think it is worthwhile for Members of Congress and their staffs to see the picture, if they approach it with the proper background. However, if they view it with the idea that it is a scientific presentation of the actual effects to be expected from an atomic attack, and if their reaction is the same as that of many of the characters in the picture, namely, complete resignation and acceptance of inevitable death, then the picture can have very serious effects.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, pursuant to the resolutions previously agreed to, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Honorable Richard M. Simpson, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, the memory of the late Honorable Steven V. Carter, a Representative from the State of Iowa, the memory of the late Honorable Alvin R. Bush, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and the memory of the late Honorable Charles A. Boyle, a Representative from the State of Illinois, I move that Senate stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon on Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Isaiah 40: 8: The word of our God shall stand forever.

Almighty God, whatever the duties and responsibilities may be ours during this day, wilt Thou bestow upon us the blessings of Thy constant care and Thy unfailing presence.

Wilt Thou free our minds from anxiety and our hearts from fear, lifting them by Thy grace out of doubt into faith and out of despair into hope.

Help us to see and lay hold of the treasures of each passing hour and inspire us to share them cheerfully with Thy needy children.

When night draws nigh and the evening shadows gather round about us may we have the blessed remembrance of Thy companionship and the joy of knowing that we have had some part in building a better world.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 7, 1960, was read and approved.

THE LATE HONORABLE THOMAS A. JENKINS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme sorrow that I announce the death of former Congressman Thomas A. Jenkins, of Ironton, and the 10th Ohio District, on December 21, last.

Mr. Jenkins served for 34 years as a Member of this House, retiring because of ill health at the end of the 85th Congress. It is my understanding he served longer in the House of Representatives than did any other Member from Ohio.

Born in Oak Hill, Jackson County, Ohio, on October 23, 1880, of poor but honest and humble Welsh immigrant parents, Tom Jenkins' life was one of accomplishment, which again demonstrates the opportunity America and our system of government afford to all who wish to work hard and live an honest and upright life.

As a boy, Tom worked in the coal mines to earn money for an education. Graduating from Providence University, he taught school for a while, then studied law at Ohio State University, and was admitted to the bar in 1907. He was elected prosecuting attorney of Lawrence County for two terms, and later—in 1922—was chosen to serve as State senator. It was my honor and my privilege, as Lieutenant Governor, to swear Tom Jenkins into office. Two years later, in 1924, he was elected by the people of the 10th Congressional District of Ohio, to represent them in the 69th Congress, where he continued to serve until his retirement. At that time he was the second ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. It had long been his desire to live to become chairman of that great committee, and to thus follow in the footsteps of another great Ohioan, once chairman of the Ways and Means Committee—William McKinley.

In his early career in Congress, Mr. Jenkins served as a member of the Immigration and Naturalization Committee and was the author of several legislative measures of importance in connection with our national welfare. He was also a member of the Insular Affairs Committee and for a short time a member of the District of Columbia Committee. He was named chairman of the Food Study Committee, and during the time he served—from 1944 to 1946—did splendid work. At the time of his retirement, Mr. Jenkins was also a member of the very important Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Always taking a deep interest in his party's affairs, Tom Jenkins served as a delegate to many State conventions in Ohio and to several Republican national conventions. For years he was the beloved dean of the Ohio delegation.

He was a kindly man, yet a frank and forthright individual. He had the courage of his convictions and the ability to convince others that his was the right position. Long one of the leaders of the House of Representatives, he served his State and country well. A man of character, ability, and with a great record of accomplishment, his name will long live in our State and national history.

At the time of death, Tom Jenkins left behind him his beloved wife, Mabel, and one sister. To Mrs. Jenkins and to his sister, we of the Ohio delegation—and I am sure I speak for the full membership of the House—extend our sincere sympathy in the great loss which has been theirs.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that other Members of the House who desire to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, like those who have preceded me I also admired and respected our late colleague and friend, Thomas A. Jenkins, of Ohio. He always greeted me with a warmness and friendliness that was characteristic of his fine spirit and personality.

His passing is met with sorrow by those who knew and respected him as a friend and colleague.

I should like to join with others in conveying an expression of sympathy to Mrs. Jenkins and the members of his family in their bereavement.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to put into words the thoughts that rise in one's mind when trying to write out something to say about a man you had such deep and sincere affection for as I had for Tom Jenkins. He was one of the finest men I met when I came to Congress and a real deep and true friendship, founded on instant respect for each other, was started. He was a man who accomplished much because he knew that to be a leader he had first to be the servant of all. His courage and courtesy were matched only by his wisdom and knowledge of men and his efficient and effective service was crowned by his humble spirit. He wanted to help wherever he could and he did help many.

I glory in having had his friendship and as time goes by his wisdom and his gentleness will always be precious memories.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to our departed brother, the Honorable Tom Jenkins, of Ironton, Ohio. In my book, Tom Jenkins was one of nature's noblemen. I knew him when I first came to Congress, 17 years ago, because Tom has many relatives in my hometown of Wenatchee, Wash.

Tom Jenkins was one of the kindest men it has ever been my privilege to know, and he certainly wrote a record in his 34 years of service here in this House.

I wish to join the rest of my colleagues in extending heartfelt sympathies to Mrs. Jenkins and Tom's family.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in paying tribute to one of Ohio's most beloved political figures—and a man whose long and distinguished service in this body was rivaled only by yourself and a few other members—the late Thomas A. Jenkins.

Tom represented the district which is just across the Ohio River from mine, and I truthfully believe that he was almost as well known in West Virginia as he was in his homeland. One still hears much favorable mention of his name and devoted career of public service on both sides of the river.

Tom Jenkins rose from humble beginnings in his hometown of Oak Hill, Ohio, to render almost three generations of loyal service to the American people, and his district, his State, and his Nation will miss him.

Mr. MOELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House in eulogy of the late Honorable Thomas A. Jenkins.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad privilege to join with my colleagues from Ohio and indeed with all those who knew the Honorable Thomas Jenkins in paying tribute to his memory in this Chamber where he served for so many eventful years.

It was I who succeeded Tom Jenkins as the Representative from the 10th District of Ohio when he was, regrettably, forced to retire because of the illness which eventually led to his death only slightly more than 2 weeks ago. If I have learned one thing since I stepped into his office—I do not say his shoes for they will remain unfilled—it is that if I can learn to serve the people of my district as he served them I need have no fear when I am called upon to look them in the eyes or to shake their hands. For his countless friends in our eight counties of Ohio did not wait until his passing to impress upon me the high regard they held for his qualities and his character. The esteem and affection with which he was universally regarded shone through wherever his name was mentioned and in whatever company. There was no conscious effort to so impress me. It was simply an honest and deep-seated feeling of admiration and friendship which showed itself spontaneously and which, as with all true emotion, could not be repressed.

Tom Jenkins' devotion to his people knew no bounds of party, of station in life, of religion, or of color. This I know from the testimony of those who knew him and who learned to love him because of this very quality. In every nook and corner of the 10th Ohio District I have met people, strangers to me, who felt themselves indebted to him because of some favor, large or small, or of some accomplishment he performed for them or for their area. Such testimony to his service came from Democrats and from Republicans and from those with no party affiliation; it came from Catholics, Protestants, Jews, and those with no professed religion; it came from farmers, from pensioners, from workmen, from businessmen, from politicians, from lawyers, and from clergymen. There were few indeed who did not have reason to thank Tom Jenkins for something he had done in his 34 years of service in the House of Representatives.

Whether it was a little back country road which needed resurfacing or the building of a huge dam and reservoir, no job was too large or too small for Tom Jenkins to lend his support if it could be shown that it was needed by a few or many of his constituents. The Tom Jenkins Dam which backs up Burr Oak Lake and provides recreational facilities and water supplies for thousands of our people stands as a monument to his memory. So too do a great many small projects which he pushed to completion. The mighty Ohio River has felt the impress of his achievements, but equally important to many of those he served were the conservation and improvement works he sponsored along its tributaries and back waters. But it is not only in these enduring physical works that his memory will remain alive in our district. He will be remembered longer for the works of mercy, of charity, and of service to humanity which stand as his monument in the hearts of those who loved him and whom he loved.

Tom Jenkins first came to Washington 35 years ago as a young man in his forties. He lived to be reelected 17 times through good times and bad; through wars and depressions; through the Democratic landslides of the New Deal days, when in 1936 he was the only Republican Congressman elected from Ohio, and the Eisenhower victories of the fifties. No combination of political, economic, or international circumstances could shake Tom Jenkins from the seat which was his because he held it by the birthright of faith and love.

His closeness to the people who voted for him unfailingly stemmed from his birth as 1 of 13 children of a Jackson County farmer and miner, from his own initiation at the tender age of 10 into work as a miner in the local mines, from his early teaching career in the county schools, from his self-supported education at Ohio State University, from his practice of law among his own people, and from his long engagements in political campaigns on the premise that he wanted to serve people rather than party and justice rather than personal gain.

That is the legacy Tom Jenkins leaves behind him. It is a legacy of faith and love. While he had no children of his own to share in it, it will be treasured by the several generations whom he cared for as though they were his own—for in a larger sense they were his own. Not the least among those who will nurture this legacy in his fond widow, Mrs. Mabel Wynne Jenkins, to whom I extend my deep sympathy. Mrs. Moeller and I join with her in honoring the cherished memory of her beloved husband.

Mr. Speaker, as a fitting conclusion to these remarks I include in the RECORD an editorial of eulogy to Tom Jenkins which appeared in the Wellston, Ohio, Telegram on December 24, 1959, the date on which his earthly remains were committed to his native Ohio soil:

PEOPLE HAD FAITH IN TOM JENKINS AND HE NEVER FAILED THEM

The passing of Thomas A. Jenkins in a Columbus sanitorium Monday night, marked the end of an era in this 10th District. Really, it came to a close a year ago, when he was stricken. He tried to withdraw his candidacy for 18th term, but the day was late: all he could do was ask the people who had honored him so often, to spare him now and vote for some other candidate. Even so he lacked little more than 600 votes of being nominated. They knew full well he could never serve again, but they were loathe to leave him.

He went to Washington the first time in 1924, a young man in his early forties. Who could forget that campaign while he was striving to upset Congressman Israel M. Foster's political applecart. And so he did upset Izzie.

For 34 years thereafter he kept that seat among the mighty in Washington. To win 17 elections in a row in a district firmly committed to the two-term tradition was a great achievement. He was not without opposition by others ambitious to serve in Washington, sometimes Republicans, often by Democrats. He wintered through the New Deal landslides unscathed, when Republican Congressmen were being knocked out like tenpins.

How did he do it?

Tom Jenkins was no intellectual prodigy, and he himself would be first to concede it. Once at a political rally in Wellston when Attorney General Gilbert Bettman was running for U.S. Senator, Jenkins stole the show. Bettman belonged to the intelligentsia and made an address filled with political profundities. Then came Tom's turn:

He made it short, telling that among the 450 Congressmen in Washington, he was just average, "no professor of U.S. history, no great authority on constitutional law," he admitted, "but just a smalltown lawyer. I excel in one thing only" he said, "all Representatives in Washington would agree that none take care of their constituents' interests so well and so promptly, as Tom Jenkins."

And the audience stood up and cheered him, because Tom Jenkins had the political sense to appear no better than his audience. He knew almost every voter in this district and could call him by his first name.

So he went back every 2 years, time and again; always accumulating seniority, that invisible asset that gives a few old-timers the best committee assignments, that puts their bills ahead for an early vote. That is the difference between a one-termer and Tom Jenkins' 17 terms.

For many years he was a member of the all-powerful Ways and Means Committee that keeps tight control of the purse strings. It writes the tax bills that provides the money for most Government activities. He was on other powerful committees. Yet he introduced few bills, and his name rarely labeled any new law.

But when he wanted something he usually got it in due time. Probably his greatest accomplishment was as a member of the joint committee on new post office buildings in Washington.

Once several years ago, we were standing with him in his reception room in the House Office Building, looking out of a west window toward the White House a mile distant. It was an inspiring view. Two broad avenues, Constitution and Pennsylvania, traversed the green Mall as straight as a gunsight. Magnificent buildings of everlasting granite were spotted here and there to shelter Government departments. There were other buildings too, the National Archives, and the National Art Gallery.

It was far different from the Washington of 40 years before when these avenues were lined with rows of shoddy stores and shabby little one-story structures.

Then Tom spoke his thoughts: "If we never did much else, I know how much we did in making Washington over, in making it the most beautiful capital in the world." And for that he deserves to be forever remembered. As long as those granite blocks stand one on another, and the green grass grows, and the flowers are blooming between, Tom Jenkins' impress on Washington can never fade.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOELLER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. We are all grieved by the passing of our late colleague and beloved friend, Thomas H. Jenkins, of Ohio. Tom Jenkins was one of the most serious-minded Members of this body, a man of great capacity, who made his marked contribution to the deliberations, consideration and accomplishments of this great body. Over and above that, he was a gentleman at all times. His outlook on life was one of understanding mind. He possessed a nobility of character that profoundly impressed his colleagues.

Tom Jenkins and I served on the Ways and Means Committee before I was elected the leader of my party in this body. Throughout the years our friendship has been very close, a friendship that I valued very much and which I shall always treasure.

To his loved ones I extend my profound sympathy in their bereavement. I know they derive great consolation from the fact that he served in this body with such distinction. He was truly a great American who earned the respect, the confidence, and the friendship of all his colleagues.

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, Tom Jenkins was part of the Ohio political scene for 50 years and in that time he made many friends and few, if any, enemies. This was because of his sterling character and rugged individualism. On the national scene he was respected and admired for the same reasons. As a member of the important Ways and Means Committee for 25 years, he contributed much to significant tax legislation.

I shall always remember him for his intense devotion to Congress and particularly the House of Representatives. He believed that it was the most important part of our Government because it was in closer touch with the people. He was an honest, dedicated public servant and I join with his host of friends in mourning his loss and expressing my sympathy to Mrs. Jenkins.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly saddened when I learned of the passing of our former colleague, the Honorable Thomas A. Jenkins, of Ohio. I knew that he had been ill and that his passing was not unexpected. However, we are never ready for news of this kind.

I first met Tom Jenkins when I came to this House in the 77th Congress. At that time he was looked upon as one of the outstanding leaders of the House, due to his long and brilliant service. I came to rely upon him for advice and counsel and always found him anxious to be of any help possible.

He had a brother who had formerly lived in Colorado, and who served as manager of the chamber of commerce in Pueblo, which is in my district. He was always interested in Colorado and matters affecting our State.

Tom Jenkins was a real friend and I shall cherish happy memories of our association together in Congress. I had the highest respect and admiration for his character and ability. He was a genial person and I have greatly missed his presence with us.

I consider Tom Jenkins one of the most distinguished Americans it has been my pleasure to meet. It was a real privilege to serve with him in the House. His passing is an irreparable loss to all of us.

I extend my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Jenkins, the sister, and the other members of the family.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, an intimate association of more than a third of a century ended last month with the death of the late Congressman Thomas A. Jenkins, of Ohio. We entered the House at the same time, the beginning of the 69th Congress after being first elected on the same day in November 1924. During the 34 years of his service, Tom Jenkins became one of my closest and most beloved friends. He was a man who possessed great talents, yet never lost the common touch.

Tom Jenkins came up the hard way. As a boy, he worked in his neighborhood coal mines to earn money for an education in college and law school. He understood the problems of the ordinary citizen and was ever mindful of their needs. His schooling for the public service was obtained as prosecuting attorney and as a State senator before being elected to the House. During his long service in this body, I watched his progress up the ladder of experience. He became a high ranking member of the great Ways and Means Committee and in the latter part of his service, I was glad to select him for service on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

He was a plain man. He cared little for the tinsel of social life. The completeness with which he devoted himself to his work for his constituency, the State of Ohio and the Nation was an inspiration to many of the younger Members of the House.

A great public servant has gone to his reward. To his beloved wife and his sister, I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in these first days of the new session, we have been shocked at the news of the death of former Congressman Thomas Jenkins who from 1924 until 1959 represented Ohio's 10th District here with great distinction.

Tom Jenkins became a legend in his own lifetime. The people of his district admired, respected, and loved this man who served them with courage, devotion, and imagination through a tumultuous and crisis-ridden three and one-half decades in his Nation's history. Their feelings were fully shared by all of us who had the honor to serve with him here.

The problems and issues of importance in Tom Jenkins' district are the same in many respects as those which interest the people of the neighboring seven counties of Ohio's 15th Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent. When I came to Congress 5 years ago, this interest in common problems served to bring us together immediately. Tom's helpful advice drawn from his rich experience in public service and his friendship were of lasting value to me.

I wish to pay tribute to this dedicated statesman who gave so much to the people of his district and to the Nation. To Mrs. Jenkins and his fine family I want to join with my colleagues here in offering my sympathy in the profound loss they have suffered.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, in the early days of last month the Nation sustained a serious loss in the passing of a great and patriotic statesman, our friend and colleague, Thomas A. Jenkins. He had served with distinction, devotion, and wisdom in the House of Representatives for a period of 35 years. His public service actually convered a span of a half a century because of the previous offices he held as prosecuting attorney and State senator in his beloved State of Ohio.

It was my rich privilege to serve with this great American as one of his colleagues on the House Committee on Ways and Means. During the time of our mutual service I had opportunity to observe Mr. Jenkins' able work and I found him to be a man who addressed himself to his duties with compassionate understanding of the problems of all our citizens and with a dedicated comprehension of the basic concepts of human freedom, economic opportunity, and national strength—concepts that were inherent in the founding of our Republic that have been strengthened because of Tom Jenkins' work in our midst.

One important principle that motivated the endeavors of this great American was his insistence on fairness and equity for all the people. He worked diligently and with ability to try to improve our Federal tax structure so that its application to our citizens would be without discrimination and without unwarranted burden. In this connection it was my privilege to serve with him as a cosponsor of legislation that was known across the breadth of the land as the Jenkins-Keogh bill. This legislation was designed to alleviate the discriminatory treatment contained in existing law against self-employed individuals in providing for their retirement security. Tom Jenkins believed with conviction in the principle embodied in this bill because he recognized its justness and the merit it contained for the benefit of the American farmer, storekeeper, professional man, and the millions of other self-employed Americans.

Mr. Jenkins and I first joined in sponsoring this legislation in January 1953 at which time Mr. Jenkins introduced H.R. 10 and I was privileged to cosponsor H.R. 11. After years of perseverance and work in behalf of this constructive measure, we now seem to be on the threshold of what I hope will be the enactment of this proposal into law. If we are successful to this end, a large measure of the credit must go to our esteemed late colleague, Tom Jenkins.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that Tom Jenkins will not be able to continue to serve in this distinguished body on the occasion of the final approval of his bill. I regret, Mr. Speaker, this great American's untimely passing, but I am grateful for the privilege that was mine in serving with him.

THE LATE HONORABLE HUBERT ELLIS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER].

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the late Representative Hubert Ellis, who died on December 3, 1959, and who represented the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia for three terms from 1943 to 1949.

The Honorable Hubert Summers Ellis was born in Hurricane, Putnam County, W. Va., July 6, 1887. He attended public schools and went on to attend Marshall College in Huntington, W. Va.

Between the years before World War I, 1910–17, Mr. Ellis was engaged in banking and selling. During the First World War he served overseas as first lieutenant in the 150th Field Artillery, 42d Division. He was first elected to Congress in 1942, and served in the 78th, 79th, and 80th Congresses.

Hubert Ellis served his country effectively in both war and peace. After being in uniform during World War I, and serving in this body during World War II, Representative Ellis played an outstanding role in veterans' affairs. He was one of those outstanding citizens who felt that the veterans in peacetime have a continuing obligation to their country.

Hubert Ellis was one of the early members of Huntington Post 16 of the American Legion. That splendid post has had a most interesting history of special leadership in the community of Huntington. An example of that leadership is the fact that it was the post which helped spearhead the movement for a statewide high school band festival, held regularly in Huntington for many years.

Mr. Ellis served as West Virginia Department Commander of the American Legion in 1933 and 1934.

In his home city of Huntington, Representative Ellis is especially remembered for his successful efforts in laying the groundwork for the erection of the splendid new Federal office building there. He secured a congressional appropriation for the purchase of the site, and when this amount proved too small, he helped raise locally by subscription the required additional amount for the purchase of the land.

Mr. Ellis was instrumental in securing the location in Huntington of a war plant of the Navy, which was leased to the Sylvania Electric Products Co. After the war, he was one of the earliest advocates of securing full peacetime use of the Sylvania plant, on which the General Services Administration is now accepting bids.

Mr. Ellis was a spokesman for his home community in securing the initial Federal approval of funds for what is today the magnificent Tri-State Airport, a facility which is continuing to be developed as a key air transportation facility serving the States of West Virginia, Kentucky and Ohio.

Hubert Ellis was a patriot, a man of sober judgment, a man who was not found wanting for the attributes which go to make a great Member of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this subject at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly join in the sentiments expressed by Congressman KEN HECHLER concerning the recent passing of the Honorable Hubert Ellis, a distinguished West Virginian, who enjoyed the privilege of representing West Virginia's Fourth Congressional District in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Ellis served with my late husband. His passing is a great loss to our home State, and I extend sincerest sympathy to his family.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, Hubert Ellis was a very dear friend of mine. We came to Congress at the same time and were sworn in together on January 3, 1943. Hubert was a very sincere and hardworking Member of this body.

I wish to join my colleagues in extending deepest sympathy to Mrs. Ellis and to the Ellis family.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, this small, but nonetheless sincere, tribute is offered in memory of a famous West Virginian who passed away last month—former Congressman Hubert Ellis, born in Hurricane, Putnam County, W. Va.

After an interesting career in banking and selling, and serving overseas as a 1st lieutenant in World War I, he came to Congress as a Member of the 78th, 79th, and 80th Congresses.

Although I never knew Congressman Ellis personally, I have great respect for his devotion to God and country, and the good works he did in Congress.

To his family I extend deepest sympathy.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regretted the death of our good friend and colleague, Hubert Ellis, of West Virginia. He was a rugged American patriot, who served his country well in both war and peace. Serving overseas as an artillery lieutenant in World War I, he was closely associated with veterans' affairs. Following his election to Congress in 1943, he was elected to membership on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs where he rendered outstanding service. He believed our country had a continuing obligation to the men who fought to defend America and was intensely interested in their welfare. He was deeply devoted to the progress of West Virginia and was an able advocate wherever its interests were concerned.

In the death of Hubert Ellis, West Virginia and the Nation have lost an outstanding citizen. Those of us who were privileged to serve with him have lost a dear friend. I extend my deepest sympathy to his family.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to our late colleague, the Honorable Hubert Ellis, who died on December 3, 1959.

Mr. Ellis represented the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia in the 77th, 78th, 79th, and 80th Congresses. It was our privilege to serve together in the 79th Congress.

Hubert Ellis was a warm and considerate man, a highly respected public servant, who served faithfully his State and the country.

To Mrs. Ellis and the other members of his family I extend my sincere sympathy.

THE LATE HONORABLE WILL E. NEAL

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I am sad to report to my colleagues the passing of a distinguished Member of this body during the 83d and 85th Congresses, Dr. Will E. Neal, of Huntington, W. Va., who died on November 12, 1959.

Dr. Neal was born October 14, 1875, in Lawrence County, Ohio. He was graduated from Proctorville High School in 1894. He was awarded the bachelor of science degree from National Normal University, Lebanon, Ohio, in 1900. He received his medical degree at the University of Cincinnati in Ohio in 1906, after which for more than 50 years he was engaged in general practice of medicine in Huntington.

It is typical of Dr. Neal's human sense of balance and sense of humor that in his official biography in the Congressional Directory he should have included this phrase, "general practice of medicine in Huntington since 1907 with a rest period of 3 years as mayor of Huntington and occasional foreign travel periods since 1945." Of course, Dr. Neal was being facetious when he referred to a "rest period" since he never rested in his unselfish effort to help his fellow man, whether as a healing physician or in the art of statesmanship.

Representative Neal was a long-time member of the Huntington Park Board, 1931–52; a member of the West Virginia Public Health Council, 1936–40. At the age of 75 he was elected to the House of Delegates of the West Virginia Legislature, being the only Republican on Huntington's five-member slate who was elected to the house of delegates in 1950.

He served in this body from 1953 to 1955, and again from 1957 to 1959. During the period when he was out of Congress, Dr. Neal served as a medical consultant to the Foreign Operations Administration in Afghanistan and Nepal.

Dr. Neal in his service to his community, State and Nation was proud of the fact that he was a constructive conservative. He had deep and rocklike convictions. Yet he had that rare quality of being able to disagree without being disagreeable. I never knew a man with so many friends—warm friends whom he collected over many years. I do not think there is or was a single man in Huntington, W. Va., who had more friends, and he made friends by his unselfish service and also through the gentle words and kind deeds with which he cheered and strengthened those he met along the way.

Mr. Speaker, I include the fine remarks of Rev. Garrett H. Evans, of the First Methodist Church of Huntington, at the funeral of Dr. Neal:

We are gathered here today to pay tribute to a truly great man Dr. Will E. Neal. You know that, in part, far better than I do. Many of you were his patients, and are aware of the fact that he practiced medicine as a calling and as an art, lifting it far above mere professionalism. Many of you worked with him as he gave himself as a public servant. With dedication, devotion, and humor he brought to politics the integrity which it deserves.

One reads with awe of the many accomplishments and interests of this man, remembering, too, that he was a devoted husband and father. It is with gratitude that we remember his integrity and his compassion.

William Channing once wrote: "The greatest man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from within and from without; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms; and is most fearless under menace and frowns; and whose reliance on truth, on virtue, and on God is most unfaltering."

By these or any other standards, Dr. Will Neal was a great man. He was great because he never sought greatness. From the brief period in which I knew him, and from the things you his friends have told me, I am sure I can say that here is a man who found himself because he lost himself, in the sense that Jesus used that figure of speech.

I am sure, too, that Dr. Neal was able to do all that he did because he took into account the reality of God. He was a man of faith. He obviously believed the Biblical teaching that at the center of the universe there is a righteous power to whom every human being owes allegiance as the source of life and law. No man is perfect, and undoubtedly Dr. Neal made mistakes—but no man ever questioned his integrity, for he took into account the divine will that is forever present and at work in our world.

Now death has closed one chapter of his life. A poet, upon the death of her father, wrote:

"A giant pine, magnificent and old,
Stood stanch against the sky and all around
Shed beauty, grace and power. Within its fold
Birds, safely reared their young. The velvet ground
Beneath was gentle, and the cooling shade
Gave cheer to passers-by. Its towering arms
A landmark stood, erect and unafraid,
As if to say, 'Fear naught from life's alarms.'

"It fell one day. Where it had dauntless stood Was loneliness and void. But men who passed
Paid tribute—said, 'To know this life was good
It left its mark on me. Its work stands fast.'
And so it lives. Such life no bonds can hold—
This giant pine, magnificent and old."

The memory of the living man remains, and shall have its influence. But greater than that, his soul lives. We can bury the body, but we cannot bury the soul. You have heard read in the ritual today the great expressions of our Christian faith as recorded in the Scriptures. In the wisdom of Solomon, an apocryphal book, this truth is repeated:

"For God created man to be immortal, and made him in the image of his own eternity—the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there can no evil touch them. In the sight of the unwise, they seem to die, and their going from us is thought to be destruction; but they are in peace, and their hope is full of immortality; for God hath proved them and found them worthy of himself."

Here is the comfort for the family that bears a loneliness which can never be removed. Here is the hope that transcends any despair. Here is the challenge that brings us all face to face with the ultimate reality of both life and death. We are grateful for the promises of God: and we are grateful for this man who demonstrated them in his life. We know that "God has proved him, and found him worthy of himself."

Mr. Speaker, I also include at this point in the RECORD the statement of the Governor of the State of West Virginia, The Honorable Cecil H. Underwood, on the passing of Dr. Neal:

Dr. Neal represented my district in Congress. In addition to being my Congressman and a colleague in the house of delegates in 1951, he was a close personal friend. He was a distinguished physician, a dedicated public servant and a man who understood people and their problems. West Virginia will miss him. Mrs. Underwood and I extend our sympathy to Mrs. Neal and family.

Mr. Speaker, one of Dr. Neal's personal traits is worthy of mention at this point because it so typified the man and his nature. So many of us have experienced the thrill of walking down the street, having Dr. Neal take us by the arm, and share his friendly greeting with scores of others as we walked along. That was symbolic of his whole life as he took countless others by the arm and helped them, unselfishly, cheerfully, and tirelessly.

I extend my deepest personal sympathy to his widow, the former Miss Susan Witten, and his three sons, Dr. William L. Neal, Dr. Thomas E. Neal, and Joe Neal.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this subject at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I fully and completely agree with the feelings expressed by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Congressman HECHLER, in connection with the recent passing of Dr. Will Neal, an outstanding legislator, who formerly represented the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia.

I had the honor to serve with Dr. Neal, and his passing is a grievous loss to each of us. He will be greatly missed by his many friends. To Mrs. Neal and his family I can only extend deepest sympathy.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HECHLER. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that today I bespeak the sentiments of a majority of West Virginians here on the floor of the House, as well as an impressive number of fellow citizens in my native State, when I rise to the sad privilege of trying to put into weak words the tremendous sense of loss we all feel at the passing of the Honorable Will E. Neal, for two terms a Member of this House.

Our late and beloved colleague was a man who had a long and honorable service to his fellow man.

By profession he was a medical doctor, a proud and happy man in the certain knowledge that from the moral earth which has nurtured so many of our distinguished men of affairs he had risen through his own efforts to an outstanding place in his chosen profession.

By avocation, he was a humanitarian, intensely interested in the spiritual equation as well as the medical diagnosis and its eventual prognosis. His avocation was no better stressed than at one time when he answered a critic who had crossly emphasized that he wasted too much time with people who were politically incapable of helping further his public career.

His reply to the critic expressed, I think, his philosophy of life and living, in amity and harmony with his fellow men and women.

You never waste time when you are dealing with men and women and the problems of all human existence.

He was born October 12, 1875, in modest circumstances in Lawrence County, Ohio. From the outset of his mature life, he demonstrated a natural gift for hard work, close application to the old precepts of moral living, and close study of the best to be found in the outpourings of the great minds of the past.

He very early demonstrated his interest in politics when, on the first occasion he was privileged to exercise his vote, he walked during his lunch hour from the country school where he was teaching to vote for President William McKinley.

This political awareness continued throughout his life, and, if he had any regret of which I am aware, I would say he deplored and was dismayed at the manner in which small men in high public office, both locally and otherwise, tended to debase the ideals of the Republic's Founding Fathers and serve their own ends, ambitions, and tastes at the expense of the basic essentials of our free system of self-government.

After obtaining his medical education at the University of Cincinnati, from his home he commuted weekly to tend to a small grocery store at Hanging Rock, Ohio. Later he moved across the Ohio River from his place of birth to nearby Huntington, W. Va., a city of promise and youthful vigor.

His rise was rapid in his profession. He was regarded by his peers in medicine as an outstanding physician. He was firmly established in his chosen work and he and the former Miss Sue Witten, of Marietta, Ohio, were busy at the task of raising a family, taking part in civic affairs jointly, and savoring the strength and phenomenal growth of the city of Huntington, when the first call to public service came.

He was chosen for two successive terms as Huntington's mayor.

It is here that I would like to recite the story from one of his intimates of the unfortunate aftermath of his first venture in politics.

He had retired from the mayor's office just as the great depression of the late twenties arose to plague all of our people. As the story comes to me from one who knows, Dr. Neal related that he found, at the conclusion of his last term, that he had endorsed obligations for his friends to the extent of a figure slightly less than $80,000.

"I stayed up for an entire night," he related in his mild fashion, "debating whether or not to stand by my commitments, or to take the easy way of repudiation. My honor won the night and within 2 years, I had retired those debts at the expense of often working around the clock."

It was the mark of this man that he never took the easy way but honored his commitments to the fullest extent, not only in his professional capacity but in his personal and political life, as well.

Just prior to the great war with the Axis, Dr. Neal retired—in a sense. However, he could always be located in his office, at the rolltop desk he had first purchased as a young medical man. And it is no secret that his waiting room was always full.

Then came the days of the conflict, and Dr. Neal returned to active practice just as before, vigorously, compassionately, and with the innate skill of the born physician.

After the war, his pursuits were varied. He and Mrs. Neal visited the battlefields of France where one of their four sons had been lost on D-day in Normandy. They traveled extensively elsewhere, and, as always, our late colleague continued to demonstrate his keen curiosity about how the rest of humanity fared.

His travels included a visit to Australia and adjacent regions. He could discuss with great clarity and authority the problems of people and places far beyond the ordinary mind.

In 1950, he was once again called to the task of public service. At the importunities of many of his friends, he sought and won a term in the West Virginia House of Delegates. His career there was distinguished by his consuming devotion to his duty and his abounding concern with the time-tested principles of the Republic.

Two years later, he was called to an office which, in my belief and in his as well, constitutes one of the most important in our Nation—Member of the House of Representatives.

During his first term, he was a member of the House Committee on Public Works. From this position, he was a diligent advocate of constructive public works programs in the Nation. He was farsighted enough to see that ill-advised public works programs are false economy and those who temporarily benefit eventually rue the day they proposed schemes which impair the public credit, create inflation, and, in a great sense, erode still further the people's will to self-reliance in their ability to solve their own collective problems.

His record during the second session he served here is well known to most of you. You will remember his unfailing courtesy, his gentle manner of speaking in public speech and private conversation, and the courtesy which always shines strongly when it is inborn and not artificially acquired.

Friends are scarce to come by. It is a sad thing, but too few of us can assess properly the scope and circumstance of our real circle of friendship.

But it is my pleasure, in the sense of a sad duty, to note for the RECORD and the stimulation of the memories of my colleagues of the life and career of a man who fought a good fight, ran a swift and fair race, and kept in mind, always, the words of the poet, Scott:

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, Will Neal was a member of the same committee as myself for a number of years.

There I had a chance to know of his character and integrity in the many ways that are given to Congressmen.

Many of these sessions were closed to the public. In those sessions, usually a man's inner thinking comes out. From all of my experiences with Dr. Neal, I came not only to respect him but to love him for the kind of person that he really was.

He came to Congress late in life. However, in spite of this, his mind was always open to ideas and new avenues of progress for America. I have never known a man more sincere in what he believed was good for his country.

I know many of us missed Dr. Neal when he failed to return to the Congress in January. On one vist to Washington since then, he came to see me and reflected the same sweet temperament which always characterized him while a Member of Congress. I know that many of us who knew him so well will miss him, not only as a Member of Congress, but as a friend.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I too want to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to Dr. Will Neal who we all knew so well and loved so dearly.

I wish to join my colleagues in extending my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Neal and the Neal family.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, Will C. Neal came to Congress after a successful career in the practice of medicine and after devoting a good deal of his time from year to year to public service.

He was a straightforward man, one who was always on the job meeting his responsibilities and looking after the interests of his people. He was a very fine, high-grade citizen, and one whom it was my privilege to know very well.

I was very sorry to hear that he had passed away, and I wish to extend to his widow and his family my sincerest and deepest sympathy.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, it is with deepest respect and admiration that I recall the days when former Congressman Will E. Neal walked these halls of Congress. During his service in the 83d and 85th Congresses, he worked diligently and stood fast on his convictions. Although we were not of the same political party, I nevertheless appreciated his sincerity and devotion to duty. As a comember of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee he impressed me with his warm personality and ability to understand and work with his colleagues.

Dr. Neal left this world last November. I miss his quiet manner and his gentle words of wisdom, but I shall long remember him and be grateful that he passed my way. My sincere sympathy goes to Mrs. Neal, who, I am sure, was the doctor's inspiration; and to his three sons and several grandchildren.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, It is with a tone of sadness and sincere regret that I join with my colleagues this afternoon to pay tribute to our former colleague and my good friend, Dr. Will Neal. Many of you in the Chamber this afternoon served with Dr. Neal in the 83d Congress, but it was not my privilege to know him until he was elected in the 85th Congress.

My association with him was quite close as we served together as minority members on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Not only did we serve together, but we were seated side by side during many of the hearings and it was through my acquaintance with him in that way that I developed a profound respect and admiration for him. Doc Neal was a kindly person. I never knew him to be critical to another Member's point of view nor to even slightly antagonize a witness before the committee, even though the witness was presenting a position in direct conflict to the philosophy of our departed friend. With this kindness though was a conviction of standing by what he thought to be in the best interest of his constituents and to be right in his learned judgment.

Further, he was a well informed Member of Congress. The wealth of his experience in dealing with people as their family doctor gave him a keen insight into human nature that better qualified him to understand people and to appreciate their problems. His expert ability to combine this infinite understanding of people with the knowledge he was ever seeking imminently qualified him to be a Congressman.

Dr. Neal's professional experience also enabled him to make an unusual contribution to the subcommittee upon which he served. This was subcommittee No. 3, having jurisdiction over health and science. All members of the full committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were eager to have the personal views of Dr. Neal, especially upon legislation from the subcommittee dealing with matters affecting public health. We could rely on his judgment and recommendations as being impartial based on complete information and further substantiated by his long professional experience as a general practitioner.

We certainly missed this gentle but persuasive voice in the 1st session of the 86th Congress. We shall further miss that voice and counsel knowing that we will not see him again in this world. Even though he will physically not be with us, the memory of his service and fine association will remain forever in the minds of the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, but further than that to the entire membership of this House.

As a friend, I want to extend my sincere condolences to his wife, children and grandchildren and also to his many close personal friends in the State of West Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, those of us who had the privilege of serving in this body with the late Dr. Will E. Neal have been saddened by the news of his death. A distinguished physician, he carried on the general practice of medicine in his home community of Huntington for more than 50 years. A deep interest in public affairs led him to stand for election as mayor of his city, an office which he held for 3 years. Further service in the West Virginia Legislature led to his first election to Congress. He served with distinction in the House for two terms. During this time his associates learned to appreciate his sterling character, his fine abilities and his devotion to the work of the House. West Virginia and the Nation have lost a fine citizen, and we, his former colleagues, have lost a good friend. I extend my deepest sympathy to his widow and family.

Mr. DOOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I express at this time my condolences to Mrs. Neal, the wife of our former colleague, Dr. Will E. Neal and to say that it was with sadness and regret that I read of his passing.

Quiet, meditative, gentle and compassionate, he typified that combination of human qualities so seldom found in one person, namely the characteristics of the statesman and the physician.

Keen of mind, sound of judgment, and rich in years, he served his constituency and his country with dedication and devotion.

I shall miss his friendly presence in the House and I shall think of him often for he was a fine gentleman who one long remembers.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I join in paying tribute to our late colleague, Dr. Will E. Neal, who represented the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia during the 83d and 85th Congresses.

A hard, conscientious worker, Dr. Neal was an outstanding public servant, a man greatly admired and respected by all who knew him and by all who were associated with him. By formal training, he was a doctor, a profession which he practiced with honor for over 50 years. His complete, unselfish interest in the welfare of others led him into public service where he served with distinction his community, his State, his Nation.

As a young man, after completing his medical studies, Dr. Neal established himself in the growing city of Huntington, W. Va., across the Ohio River from his place of birth. From his busy medical practice, he found time to devote to the civic affairs of his community. He served his city as mayor for two successive terms. In 1950, at the age of 75, he was elected to the West Virginia Legislature. From 1953 to 1955, and again from 1957 to 1959, he was a Member of this body.

Will Neal loved people. He loved his country. His life was dedicated to his fellowman and exemplified the true meaning of the word "humanitarian."

My heartfelt sympathy goes out to Mrs. Neal and the other members of his family.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Will E. Neal symbolized an unselfishness that needs to be popularized and perpetuated if America is to reap the full advantage of her human potential. Dr. Neal practiced medicine for 45 years before becoming a Member of the House of Representatives. Rather than turn to an easy life of retirement, he chose to serve where his experience and aptitude might be of further value to his community, his district, and his country.

Dr. Neal's terms of office were in the highest tradition of one who devotes his life to the brotherhood of man. His mature thought, careful deliberation, and independent conclusions produced a record of outstanding contributions in Congress. I often talked with him about matters before the House which he insisted upon considering from all perspectives, with careful study and hours of pondering constitutional implications, so that his final decision would be certain to be in the interest of the general welfare. He did not respond to hard sell approaches to issues because he felt that careful diagnosis of every problem was a prerequisite to proper voting on all legislation.

Our departed colleague was a gentleman, a scholar, and a patriot. His equanimity, judgment, and sincerity were respected by everyone regardless of party affiliation.

The thought occurs to me that Dr. Neal's life needs to be portrayed more thoroughly among our peoples, if only to dispense with the notion that a person's active participation in business, government, and the sciences should normally cease when he reaches the twilight of his career on earth. Here was a man who had passed the three-quarter-century mark before his election to Congress the first time. His keen intellect and quick step belied those years, while, unfortunately a vast majority in our midst resign themselves to a life of inactivity long before they approach that age level. By assuming Dr. Neal's vigorous attitude and optimistic temperament, countless others might find far more enjoyment and opportunity for accomplishment in their upper years.

With the passing of Dr. Neal we have lost a firm friend, a solid Christian, and a dedicated patriot. He will be mourned far and wide, not only by the multitude of men, women, and children whom he attended in his extensive medical practice, but by every American who appreciates his devotion to duty while a Member of the Congress of the United States.

FEDERAL RESERVE'S PAYMENT TO THE TREASURY OF $266 MILLION OF SURPLUS FUNDS REPRESENTS ONLY PARTIAL REFORM—INTRODUCING A NEW BILL TO CANCEL $15 BILLION OF FEDERAL SECURITIES AND BRING ABOUT OTHER REFORMS IN THE HANDLING OF PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill to cancel $15 billion of Federal securities. These securities are in the hands of the Federal Reserve banks, and they have already been paid for once. If we cancel these securities, we will save the taxpayers huge amounts of unnecessary interest charges which the taxpayers are now paying. We will also make it impossible for the taxpayers to be required to pay for these debt obligations again when they become due.

Mr. Speaker, last week the Federal Reserve System took a step which it should have taken years ago. It made a payment to the Treasury out of one of its so-called surplus funds. In this instance the payment amounted to $266 million, and the receipt of payment by the Treasury will, it appears, enable the Treasury to balance its budget in the fiscal year ending June 30 and possibly even end the year with a surplus.

Actually, the amount of this payment represents only a short step. The Federal Reserve should have paid, and should now pay all of its surplus funds into the Treasury. In this case the Treasury would receive not just $266 million, but approximately $1 billion.

For several years now I have urged that the Federal Reserve's practice of building up surplus funds be stopped and that its surplus already built up be paid into the Treasury where the funds can be used to help balance the budget and possibly retire some of the national debt. In the present Congress the bill introduced by me on this subject—H.R. 8301—on July 20 of last year calls for the Federal Reserve System to make a total payment of $1 billion from its surplus funds. This bill is still needed and should be enacted. While the voluntary reform which the Federal Reserve people have now announced is good as far as it goes, it does not go far enough. And by stopping short, with a $266 million payment when they should have made a $1 billion payment, the Federal Reserve people have shown considerably less than a full understanding of the Treasury's need for its money, and considerably less than a full understanding of good management of the public's money. These surplus funds lie idle and uninvested at the very time the Treasury is deeply in debt and paying a fabulous rate of interest on the borrowed money.

THE FED HAS NO NEED FOR SURPLUS FUNDS

The Federal Reserve System has no need for any surplus funds whatever. There is no conceivable emergency which could arise by which it would need surplus funds. This fact has been more than amply demonstrated by testimony of almost all members of the present Board of Governors, including Chairman Martin. It has been my privilege to ask these gentlemen about the need for surplus funds, and none of them has been able to think of any real need for them. The best argument they have been able to give for keeping surplus funds is that it looks nice to have the System's published balance sheets show a surplus, because the general public is accustomed to seeing a surplus of some amount reported in the condition statements of the private banks and in the balance sheets of the nonfinancial corporations. Thus the essence of the argument is this: Since those members of the general public who spend their time reading the balance sheets expect private corporations to be holding surplus funds at any given time, these people should have the pleasure of seeing a surplus item in the Federal Reserve's balance sheet, even though in the case of the Federal Reserve holding the surplus funds serves no other purpose and is making a dent in the pocketbooks of the taxpayers, including the taxpayers who may read the Federal Reserve's balance sheet.

THE FED'S INCOME IS SEVERAL TIMES AS GREAT AS ITS NEEDS

How do these surplus funds arise?

In the first place, the Federal Reserve System receives its income from interest payments made by the Treasury on Government bonds and other Federal obligations which the Federal Reserve is holding. It is holding at the present time approximately $27 billion, face value, of Federal debt.

From these current interest payments, the Federal Reserve meets its expenses, which are mostly the cost of providing free services to the member banks of the Federal Reserve System. Even so, the Federal Reserve has each year huge sums left over after expenses. In fact, its annual interest income is several times the amount of its annual expenses. Consequently, at the end of each year it turns back to the Treasury most of its income after expenses. In fact, in recent years it has followed the practice of turning back 90 percent, but holding out 10 percent which it puts into a surplus fund.

It seems to me that good management of the public's money dictates two reforms:

First, all of these surplus funds should, as I have indicated, be paid back to the Treasury and paid back promptly. There is no excuse for the Federal Reserve's holding public money idle and unused when the public is having to pay interest on borrowed money.

Second, the Federal Reserve System should not collect such huge amounts of interest payments in the first place. It is now collecting these payments and holding them until the end of the year before returning them to the Treasury, which means that the taxpayers are paying a year's interest on the funds by reason of the fact that the funds are being held idle when they could, instead, be used to retire an equivalent amount of debt. At the end of last year, the Federal Reserve System turned back to the Treasury $645 million of interest payments accumulated throughout the year.

NEW BILL WOULD SAVE THE TAXPAYERS' MONEY IN TWO WAYS

Today I am introducing a bill which calls for the Federal Reserve System to turn over to the Treasury for cancellation $15 billion of U.S. bonds and other debt obligations which it is holding. The bill would also require the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to the Federal Reserve System, in place of these interest-bearing obligations, a non-interest-bearing demand note in the amount of $15 billion.

Several good practical effects would result from the passage of this bill:

First. As has been indicated, the bill would bring about a reduction in the cost of the debt. It would allow the Treasury to use, on a current basis, funds now going to make interest payments on $15 billion of debt. It would thus save the taxpayers the interest costs on an equivalent amount of money over the long period which the Federal Reserve holds this money before returning the money.

Second. The bill would have some tendency to reduce the general level of interest rates, for the simple reason that the Treasury would have less debt outstanding and, in carrying on refunding operations, would be less at the mercy of the operators of the so-called money market.

BILL WOULD PROVIDE AN IMPORTANT SAFEGUARD AGAINST THE FEDERAL RESERVES GIVING AWAY PUBLIC ASSETS

Third. The bill would provide an important safeguard against the possibility the Federal Reserve System might transfer some of its Federal securities to the private banks. Any reduction in the amount of Federal debt obligations which the Federal Reserve is holding necessarily amounts to a free gift of these securities, or the free gift of an equivalent amount of the securities, to the private banks. Acquiring Government debt obligations involves no cost to the private commercial banks. It does, however, make a difference to the taxpayer whether the Federal Reserve holds Federal debt obligations or whether the private banks hold them. In one case the interest payments come back into the Treasury, and in the other case, the interest payments go into bank profits.

Last year the Federal Reserve authorities recommended a bill to revise the reserve requirements of member banks—the so-called vault cash bill—which, as originally recommended, would have given the Federal Reserve both the mechanical authority and the moral support of Congress for transferring huge quantities of the securities it is holding over to the private banks. Any such transfer would, as I have indicated, necessarily be on a cost-free basis to the private banks. In passing the vault cash bill, however, Congress tacked on expressions of legislative intent which condemn any idea that the Federal Reserve might reduce its holdings of Federal securities. Nevertheless, the present Federal Reserve authorities have a way of taking the bit into their own teeth and doing what they please to do, notwithstanding laws and expressions of congressional intent. They have come to believe that the Federal Reserve System is a fourth branch of the Government which stands over and above the three constitutional branches of the Government. They have, in fact, openly declared themselves to be independent of the Government, and they have had considerable support for this view from the head of the executive branch. And in many other ways their actions suggest they feel they are not subject to the laws that govern mortal men. So, just in case the Federal Reserve authorities get it into their heads to reduce their holdings of Federal securities despite the recent and clear congressional mandate to the contrary, having $15 billion less of marketable Government debt obligations would make such an idea much less tempting. At least there would be $15 billion less of Government securities which could be given away. Since the new obligations which the Federal Reserve would receive in exchange for these $15 billion of securities would be non-interest-bearing, there would be no temptation to give them away and no temptation to the commercial bankers to try to acquire them.

The bill would reduce the amount of the Federal debt subject to the debt limitation by $15 billion, since only interest-bearing obligations are subject to the debt limitation.

In conclusion, H.R. 8301, to require the Federal Reserve to turn its surplus funds back into the Treasury, is a badly needed piece of legislation. And the new bill which I have introduced today to cancel $15 billion of the Federal debt held by the Federal Reserve System is also a badly needed piece of legislation. I hope it will be given favorable consideration.

The bill I have introduced today is as follows:

A bill to provide for the retirement of $15,000,000,000 of the interest-bearing debt of the United States

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System shall direct each Federal Reserve bank to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount of interest-bearing obligations of the United States held by it such that the aggregate book value (the value at which such securities are carried on the books of the Federal Reserve banks as assets) of the obligations so transferred shall equal $15,000,000,000. Such transfers shall be effected not later than 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cancel and retire the obligations transferred to him pursuant to the first section of this Act, and shall issue to each Federal Reserve bank a nontransferable, non-interest-bearing demand note of the United States payable to such bank in an amount equal to the book value of the obligations of the United States transferred from such bank.

The Wall Street Journal of last Thursday, January 7, carried a lucid account of the Federal Reserve's payments to the Treasury from its surplus funds and from its excess income of last year. I will insert this in the RECORD for those who may be interested in the details this account contains:

FEDERAL RESERVE PAYS TREASURY $266 MILLION—IT MAY BALANCE BUDGET—RESERVE BANKS TURN OVER SUMS THEY DECIDED AREN'T NEEDED IN THEIR SURPLUS ACCOUNTS

WASHINGTON.—The Federal Reserve System handed the Treasury a year-end bonus of $266 million that will help the administration balance the budget for the fiscal year ending June 30—and might even result in a surplus.

The $266 million comes from a decision by the Federal Reserve Board, in consultation with the 12 Reserve banks, to pay the Treasury certain amounts of money they decided were over and above their surplus needs.

Treasury officials insisted they were not told about the payment until about a week ago, so that the money is a "windfall" for the administration.

In November, administration officials were taking a gloomy view of their chances to balance the budget for the current fiscal period. While spending had been calculated, as of mid-September, at $78.9 billion and revenues at $79 billion for a $100 million surplus, officials figured the 116-day steel strike had knocked the budget in the red by as much as $600 million.

Since then, as business has snapped back better than expected in the wake of the steel strike, these same officials have been sounding a happier note. Lately, they have been figuring they either would hit a balance or come close to it.

With an extra $266 million in their laps, however, their chances of balancing the budget—or even ending up with a surplus—are that much improved.

The $266 million windfall came about because the Reserve System decided it had been putting more money than needed into the surplus accounts at the Reserve banks.

The Federal Reserve System regularly pays the Treasury all of its net earnings that are left after dividends and after provision for building up surplus to 100 percent of subscribed capital at those banks where surplus was below that amount. This latter provision amounts to about 10 percent of net earnings.

The Reserve Board concluded that keeping surplus at the level of subscribed capital would be enough. So it changed the practice of adding about 10 percent of the annual net earnings of the Federal Reserve banks to the surplus accounts, and to pay to the Treasury the amounts by which surplus accounts topped subscribed capital.

This meant, a spokesman said, a payment to the Treasury for 1959 of $911 million instead of the $645 million it ordinarily would have received.

LOYALTY OATH

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, during the past week I received a letter which I presume was mailed to every other Member of Congress soliciting support for legislation seeking repeal of that provision of the National Defense Education Act which requires a loyalty oath and an affidavit disclaiming belief in or support of any organization which seeks the overthrow of the the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods.

At this time I want to go on record as being unequivocally opposed to the repeal of that portion of the act under which this Congress has authorized and appropriated money for the use of students.

As I wrote in reply to the letter I received:

Any American should welcome the opportunity to proclaim and/or reaffirm his loyalty to the Unitd States of America and I cannot help being suspicious of those who for any reason would attempt to avoid such expression.

Mr. Speaker, instead of attempting to find ways to discourage public expression of the support of our Government, I feel that we should encourage our young people particularly to have a deeper sense of loyalty, and a greater appreciation of the heritage which is theirs to nurture and preserve.

Each week at service club meetings and at thousands of other meetings and gatherings throughout the land, millions of Americans are proud to stand, facing the flag, and repeat together the pledge of allegiance to the flag. On such occasions we are reminded of the freedoms which we enjoy as Americans, and I believe all true Americans are inspired as they repeat:

I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the Republic for which it stands; one Nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

And inclosing, Mr. Speaker, I ask you and other Americans, what possible objection can anyone who claims or professes to be a loyal American citizen, have to signing this oath which states:

I, ————, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all its enemies, foreign and domestic.

And what stigma can be attached to the affirmation contained in this affidavit:

I, ————, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I do not believe in, and am not a member of and do not support any organization that believes in or teaches, the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods.

CAN THE AMERICAN ECONOMY ADJUST TO ARMS REDUCTION?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the economic consequences associated with possible disarmament have attracted much attention.

I commend to the attention of the Members the January 4 release of the National Planning Association, which provides a very affirmative answer to the question: "Can the American economy adjust to arms reduction?" which follows:

JOINT STATEMENT ON CAN THE AMERICAN ECONOMY ADJUST TO ARMS REDUCTION?

The National Planning Association has repeatedly stated that the American economy is productive enough to afford those national security programs which may be needed both to deter a major attack and to prevent local incidents. We believe it is of equal importance to emphasize that the American economy can also stand substantial arms reduction.

Currrent negotiations related to world arms limitations may or may not lead to dependable international controls and reduced military budgets. We will argue in this statement that plans should be developed for dealing with the economic consequences of material arms reductions.

These considerations are intended to establish that there is no valid economic argument that arms reduction would bring about economic depression. The potential increase in nondefense supply of goods and services due to economic growth could be several times larger than the increase due to a substantial reduction in armaments. In this statement we shall state the reasons why we believe the task is manageable and enumerate four phases which we believe require detailed study and planning.

1. Let us assume that an agreement providing for substantial arms reduction could become effective, for instance 5 years from now. We are now spending $46 billion per year for national security. Within a 5-year period, with no change in present programs, this amount may well exceed $50 billion annually (in present prices). Even a total disarmament would not mean that these $50 billion would disappear entirely from the budget. There would be expenditures for the liquidation of contractual obligations. Quite possibly a national and an international police force would be established which would require financial support. And in all likelihood there would be substantial expenditures for international inspection and control machinery.

At present there are large expenditures classified under national security which would have to be continued and perhaps increased in the event of arms reduction. National security expenditures now include roughly $5 billion in support of research and development activities. This represents almost 90 percent of all Federal research expenditures and more than half of all research outlays, private or public, in the United States. Many of these research projects have peacetime aspects and could be reoriented. Also the whole nuclear energy program (including the nuclear power program) and the mutual security program are classified as national security expenditures and would be continued, although with a change in emphasis.

Thus, even a comprehensive agreement regarding the reduction of armaments would not mean a complete elimination of what are now termed the national security expenditures from the budget. It would not be unreasonable to assume that with substantial reorientations, such expenditures would be reduced by only one-half (to a total of $25 billion) by 1965.

2. There are a great many urgent programs in fields other than national security in which only slow progress is being made due to budgetary limitations. It has been widely recognized that education, health, and training programs are deficient and that our programs for conservation and development of water and other natural resources do not begin to meet the prospective needs (in part, because of the high cost of national security).

While we have embarked on a comprehensive road construction program, our airports and other air facilities are still far from meeting the requirements of the jet age, not to speak of the rocket age.

The spectacular metropolitan and suburban developments have created manifold problems which require an imaginative approach for which no precedence exists in any of the present programs.

The following tabulation presents estimates of cumulative outlays over a 5-year period by Federal, State, and local areas if deficiencies in a few selected areas are to be wiped out and if needed improvements are to be made.

Cumulative expenditure requirements for selected nondefense Government programs over the next 5 years

	Billions of dollars
Education:
Classroom construction	16
Current operation	14
Total	30
Highways and skyways	75
Urban renewal, slum clearance, low-cost housing and community redevelopment	100
Water supply and conservation	60
Health and hospitals	35
Other programs (air pollution, research and development, etc.)	30

We do not pretend that these estimates are precise. They represent an evaluation of what would be required to overcome existing backlogs, to provide for anticipated needs over the next 5 years and to allow for essential improvements in these program areas. The estimates are based on reports and studies of private organizations and government agencies for these particular fields. They are quoted to give an idea of the order of magnitude.

Present spending of the Federal, State, and local governments on these programs amounts to about $30 billion per year. Continuation of this same rate of spending would still leave us at the end of a 5-year period with glaring deficiencies. Even assuming continuation of present national security programs some increase in outlays for these nondefense programs would be possible. It may well be that increased spending on all nondefense programs five years hence may rise from the current level of about $50 billion to almost $80 billion without any substantial reduction in armaments. With arms reduction total nondefense outlays may well be increased to $90 billion. Reduction in armaments, therefore, would make it possible to devote $10 billion per year more to those purposes where serious deficiencies exist than would be possible if present defense programs had to be continued. Of the $25 billion reduction in national security expenditures, $10 billion might be offset by an increase in highly desirable, nondefense related programs.

3. There is a possibility that arms reduction might be associated with a greatly expanded program for credits and technical assistance in support of foreign economic development. Such support may in part take the form not of offsetting budget expenditures but possibly of an increase in public or private capital export. We have no basis for estimating a particular magnitude for such an item but the possibility of such an increase in outlays offsetting a part of the reduction in defense spending should be kept in mind.

4. After reorientation of some of the national security programs and increases in nondefense programs, $15 billion would be left for increases in private expenditures. Our projections of private expenditures for individual consumption, domestic business investment, and capital export in 1965 (assuming continuation of present national security programs) amount to $500 billion. Therefore, a 3-percent increase in these private expenditures would be needed to bring about a complete offset for the reduction in armament spending. Considering that the total Federal, State, and local budgets would be reduced by $15 billion, a tax reduction of about 7 percent would become feasible. There seems to be little question that with tax reduction an increase in private spending or capital investments would be very likely. Assuming that the whole amount would be available for additional consumer spending, this would make a difference of 2 percent between spendable income, with and without disarmament in 1965.

If politically feasible, a reduction in armament would be highly desirable economically. It would allow the shift of resources from defense production and defense services to urgent peacetime tasks and would permit tax reduction along with the resulting increase in greater consumer satisfaction. However, the magnitude, seen in the perspective of the economy as a whole, should not be exaggerated. With a satisfactory rate of growth (let us say 4 percent per year) production of goods and services in 1965 should be more than $100 billion (in present dollars) above present levels. This means that with defense expenditures remaining at present levels, $100 billion will be available for additional consumption, business investment, or nondefense Government services. With a reduction in national security expenditures as detailed in this statement, the possible increase in these goods and services would not be $100 billion, but $125 billion. But economic growth would lead to an increase in the potential supply of nondefense goods and services several times larger than the increase resulting from a substantial reduction in armaments.

This reasoning should not be interpreted, however, as suggesting that the transition from an armament race to disarmament would be an easy matter. First, our estimates imply shifts of production from one industry to other industries, often also from one region to another with all ensuing problems of readjustment. These shifts will not come about easily. We need a careful exploration of the areas in which high priority Government programs could take the place of defense procurement and defense employment. There should be advance planning in each of the crucial areas in order to prevent hardship and serious dislocations. There should be consideration as to which of these programs could best be done by the Federal Government, which best by State and local governments. Also the problem of tax resources would require consideration. A reduction in defense spending might permit Federal tax reduction while a considerable part of the increase in nondefense programs might be in areas which were under the traditional jurisdiction of State and local governments.

Some people may feel that disarmament is such a remote possibility that it is not worth while to spend any effort in that direction. To that we answer that none of this work would be in vain. In a period of protracted high-level armament we must make some progress on these nondefense programs anyway. The main difference is merely one of the speed with which we can proceed.

Moreover, unless we have a convincing economic plan for disarmament we cannot forcefully answer the argument that we fear arms reduction because it may cause a breakdown of our economic system. In the contest between the rival economic, social, and political systems at times the threat of increased armament will be used, at times the promise of disarmament will be used and has been used. Competitive coexistence requires us to be prepared for both strategies.

HON. GORDON CANFIELD, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and to include newspaper editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, when our colleague, the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, GORDON CANFIELD, announced he would not run again for reelection, the thousands of people who love and respect him were a bit stunned and perplexed. They felt that as he had played such an active role in the affairs of our Government, it was unthinkable he should not continue as a part of it. For 17 years he served as secretary to the Member of Congress whom he succeeded and he is now completing his 20th year as an elected Member. A total of 37 years of association with Congress is a long time. He will be sorely missed but his example of courage, honest thinking, sense of fairplay, and his heart of friendship will long endure. His departure will be a loss to the Nation as well as to his many friends in Congress.

The people of his State of New Jersey recognize his worth and the loss to the State that his decision will mean and I am pleased to insert as part of my remarks editorials from the following New Jersey newspapers: Paterson Evening News, Passaic Herald News, Bergen Evening Record, and Newark Evening News:

GORDON CANFIELD RETIRES AND THE DISTRICT LOSES "A CHAMP"

Things won't be the same in Passaic County politics from here on in—at least, in the even years of congressional elections.

GORDON CANFIELD has been the Congressman from this Eighth District through a generation, and only the youngish oldtimer will be able to recall that it was his "boss," the late George N. Seger, who was his predecessor. That was 20 years ago.

Thus, for well-nigh two decades CANFIELD has served us in Washington, and as a public servant and as a Republican candidate every 2 years he was a veritable champion. In the Republican heydays and in the lean years when the magic name of Franklin D. Roosevelt was cutting down Republicans the people remembered GORDON CANFIELD'S beneficences and he was always top man on his ticket. Some good candidates fell by the wayside before the CANFIELD juggernaut.

The answer was Congressman CANFIELD'S dedicated service and, in truth, it was this around-the-clock devotion which has finally determined him to retire from the political wars. To have continued in the only way he knows how to campaign or to serve in office might have permanently impaired his health.

So who can quarrel with his decision not to run again, in spite of the void he will leave and the heart tug his decision to retire inspires? He has certainly earned the right to call it a day as a candidate after 37 years in Washington.

What was the secret of Congressman CANFIELD's unmatched success? It was being with and for people. It could just as well have been coined in his name when it was said that to have a friend one must be a friend.

Just a few years ago an overexuberant Democratic candidate, seeking to probe the CANFIELD success secret, came up with the bombastic charge that all the Congressman had to offer was his friendship for the little man. That did it—touched off such an atomic indignation among the rank and file of the voters that the ingenious candidate was snowed under.

The "little man" was there at the polls to vote for his friend. It has always been so—no letter unanswered, no opportunity for service ignored. Thousands knew his friendly intercession, his always solicitous concern for the people of his district.

During World War II, Congressman CANFIELD became restive at home. So he shipped aboard a freighter, made the rounds of the camps where his hometown boys were serving, comforted them, brought messages back to anxious loved ones. He braved the dangers of the sea, walked in the historical London blitz, was horrified at the Nazi slaughterhouse in Buchenwald. Here was one man who knew firsthand what he talked about to his people, and they believed in him.

In Congress, Mr. CANFIELD stood up and was counted. He was one of the first to warn of the threat of communism, because he had seen its creeping infection spreading when he was in Europe. He fought for proper defenses, for recognition of missile preparedness. He alone of all Republican candidates was endorsed by labor which constantly was on the Democratic side.

But he was no rubberstamp for any man or any cause. He had courage.

And so when GORDON CANFIELD decides now he cannot rally the strength of another vigorous campaign with all its exactions, when he feels he would like to nestle home with his faithful family and rest a bit on the laurels he has earned, who among us will say him "nay"?

The Eighth District yields him to the inexorability of time only in Congress.

There will be other opportunities for service for this man of decency, integrity, and dedication.

Meantime, all people of good will, regardless of politics, will wish him well as he begins his final year of service in Congress, and among these the News is happy to be counted as delighted that through all his years of matchless service we were his stanch and unremitting supporters.

Of him it will be said with truth, "Well done, thou true and faithful servant."

[From the Passaic Herald-News, Dec. 16, 1959]

GORDON CANFIELD'S RETIREMENT

The retirement of GORDON CANFIELD at the conclusion of his present term in the House of Representatives will mark the end of an era for thousands of Passaic County voters. Mr. CANFIELD'S principal asset during a political career which dates back to 1924 has been an ability to make deep and lasting friendships. To many Democrats as well as Republicans in the Eighth Congressional District, the man they know as "GORDON" is a dear friend in whose reelection they have always taken a personal interest.

The same warm feeling toward Mr. CANFIELD is evident in the Congress. In 1955, upon his return after a lengthy absence due to illness, touching tributes were paid to him by Congressmen of both parties. They also like the unassuming, hard-working, and always helpful GORDON CANFIELD.

Mr. CANFIELD began his Washington career as secretary to the late Congressman Seger, of Passaic. He had been a reporter on the old Passaic Daily News. When "the chief" died, Mr. CANFIELD was recognized as the logical successor. In 1958, Mr. CANFIELD was reelected for his 10th consecutive term. Even though his district is smaller than Passaic County, West Milford and Ringwood being in another district, Mr. CANFIELD polled nearly 10,000 votes more than the top vote-getter among the county candidates, a striking testimony to his popularity. The only time he ever came close to defeat was in 1948 when Charles S. Joelson trailed him by a mere 150 votes.

The legislative interests of Mr. CANFIELD have been the kind that do not make headlines. His particular fields were appropriations, the postal service, the Coast Guard, narcotics, and social security. He is credited with being responsible for the first appropriation to send Government narcotics agents abroad to fight the illicit narcotics traffic at its sources. He was in the forefront for years of those who advocated postal rates.

Mr. CANFIELD is better known for his helpfulness than for his legislation. He helped Clifton to obtain part of the Federal Government's quarantine station tract for a school site. His selection of candidates for appointment to the service academies by means of examinations and interviews conducted by outstanding citizens had popular approval. He was instrumental in unraveling redtape for refugees. One of Mr. CANFIELD'S Democratic opponents helped to win his reelection by charging Mr. CANFIELD with only doing little things for little people.

Mr. CANFIELD will take with him into retirement at the end of next year the best wishes of a host who prize GORDON as their friend.

AN OUTSIZE PAIR OF SHOES

Passaic County, as almost everyone knows, has gone Democratic almost all the way—freeholders, assembly, State senator. Yet for 10 consecutive terms the Eighth Congressional District, which embraces all of Passaic County except Ringwood and West Milford (in the Seventh), has returned GORDON CANFIELD to Congress, often by impressive majorities.

There's a reason of course. It can be simply stated. GORDON CANFIELD has been a good Congressman. He has just announced he will not run for reelection after his term expires next year. And, while he has earned the right to retirement, Passaic will lose the services of a valued and capable official.

Mr. CANFIELD typifies why party labels do not mean much when voters select their Congressman. Yet few present Members of Congress have been so peculiarly qualified, so carefully prepared for the position. Mr. CANFIELD, a former newspaperman, was secretary to the late Representative George Seger (Republican, Eighth). Mr. Seger coached him painstakingly as his successor apparent; so when Mr. CANFIELD finally did become a Member of the House he knew at the start more about the job than most Members ever learn. And he knew the value of prompt replies to mail, of patient listening, of constant mixing, of elaborate personal interest in every constituent's least contact with government.

Mr. CANFIELD may rarely have been spectacular, but he is thoroughly sound. In all the good connotations of the words, he is the old pro.

AFTER 10 TERMS

Representative GORDON CANFIELD, the Passaic County Republican who is retiring from Congress after 10 terms, knew a lot about his job before he took it over. He had put in 17 years as a congressional secretary, and his experience paid off in service to his constituency.

When the dean of the New Jersey delegation leaves Washington next year the State will lose an influential voice on the House Appropriations Committee, where he is recognized as an expert in Treasury and Post Office Department matters. He ranks high not only in seniority, with all of its effectiveness in Washington, but in esteem as well.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that his colleagues, Mrs. DWYER, Mr. GLENN, Mr. WALLHAUSER, and Mr. RODINO, all from New Jersey, may extend their remarks immediately following my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, we are fortunate in one respect, Mr. Speaker, in paying tribute today to our colleague, GORDON CANFIELD. We are not saying goodby quiet yet. We shall have him with us for many months to come—to enjoy the warmth of his friendship, the richness of his experience, the generosity of his thoughtfulness and kindness.

I speak from a wealth of personal experience when I cite these qualities. On numberless occasions during my 3 years as a Member of this body, I called on GORDON CANFIELD for help, advice, and information. Never did I come away disappointed. On the contrary, each experience served to impress upon me more deeply an awareness of a really remarkable person—a man who combines the highest ideals of public service with a practical, working wisdom in the ways of politics and government.

I have never known an instance, Mr. Speaker, when GORDON CANFIELD did not know exactly what he was doing and exactly why he was doing it. In a legislative body where procedures are necessarily complex and involved, our colleague has the sure and certain touch, the precise sense of timing, the unerring aim of a skilled parliamentarian.

Despite his mastery of legislative methods, however, GORDON CANFIELD has never sacrificed the purposes and ends of government to the means. His skills have always been in the service of his ideals and the interests of the people he represents. This is the hallmark of responsible politics, the test of effective representative government.

Mr. Speaker, rather than anticipate the tremendous loss to this body that GORDON CANFIELD'S departure will mean, it behooves us today to salute a great Congressman and to congratulate ourselves that he will remain with us throughout the crucial session ahead.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Speaker, I heard of the retirement at the end of this session of our esteemed colleague, the Honorable GORDON CANFIELD, through an editorial appearing in the Paterson Evening News on December 16, 1959.

This was a beautiful editorial, and has been entered in the RECORD by one of my colleagues of New Jersey. GORDON CANFIELD has been one of my dearest personal friends in my few years in Congress. As a younger member of the New Jersey congressional delegation, I have gone to him from time to time for guidance and help. With his years of experience, his kind and considerate personality, and his smiling radiance, his advice was sound, logical, and always given with a pat on the back, and I felt better after talking with my dear friend, GORDON.

While he was one of the busiest Members of Congress, he somehow found more time than the rest of us to be on the floor of the House so that invariably when we of our New Jersey delegation would appear in the middle of procedure or debate, it was GORDON CANFIELD who would brief us with a short rundown of what was occurring.

The Nation and the State of New Jersey are going to suffer a great loss upon the retirement of Representative CANFIELD, and we of the New Jersey delegation, who have looked to him as our leader, are going to find it difficult to carry on without him.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, as one proceeds through this life the cementing of fine human relationships becomes most important to many of us, and I feel that I have been accorded a high privilege and rare honor to have met, and I hope to have formed a fast friendship with the Honorable GORDON CANFIELD, who has just announced that he will not stand for reelection to this august body after 37 years of service divided between his membership and service to a Member.

I have benefited—as I am certain many others have as well—from his advice and good counsel. However, more important than this, is the outstanding dedicated service that he has rendered to his constituents, to the State of New Jersey, and to the Nation. I salute him as the dean of the New Jersey delegation in this body.

My hope and prayer for him for the future, in which Mrs. Wallhauser joins me, is that he may enjoy years of continuing service to his fellow man and that he and his family will enjoy good health and all of the things that a man of his good character so richly deserves.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my regrets that my very good friend, GORDON CANFIELD, has announced his intention to retire at the end of this session.

Congressman CANFIELD is the dean of our New Jersey delegation. For 20 years he has served in Congress with the highest sense of duty and responsibility. He has been known to all of us as a valued friend, a conscientious legislator, and a dedicated public servant.

To his district, he is known as one whose greatest concern has always been the people and their welfare. His constituents regard him not only as their Representative, but as their devoted friend. They know that he will spare no effort in their behalf, and that he is always ready with a sympathetic ear and a helping hand.

Congressman CANFIELD has earned his retirement, and we cannot begrudge it to him. But we in the House, and particularly those of us in the New Jersey delegation, will miss his presence and comradeship.

Though he, too, may miss his friends in the House, and the legislative life of which he has been so much a part, it is my earnest hope that he enjoys this new period of his life to the fullest. He will now be able to spend more time with the charming Mrs. Canfield, and to do all those many things which Congressmen miss. We wish him success and fulfillment in his well-earned retirement.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest experiences of my first year in the Congress of the United States was my association with GORDON CANFIELD, dean of the New Jersey delegation. I soon found the personal qualities which for over 37 years endeared him to the people of the Eighth District of New Jersey. His patience, understanding of human nature, his willingness to help wherever possible, his very real love of his fellow man, combined with personal integrity, knowledge of law, devotion to duty, and reverence for the ideals of the American system of government and way of life make him a truly great representative of the people.

I personally shall miss his sage advice and warm comradeship but, more important than my personal loss, is the loss to those whom he served the best—his constituents, his State, and his country.

Speaking for myself and as the Representative of all of the people of the First District of the State of New Jersey, I extend to GORDON CANFIELD our thanks for his outstanding accomplishments in the Halls of Congress and our best wishes for health and happiness in the years ahead.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, it was with great regret that I heard last month that our distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Mr. CANFIELD, has decided to terminate his services on Capitol Hill after 37 years as Congressman and secretary.

When I first came to the Hill 20 years ago, as a secretary myself, I had the privilege of living with GORDON at the home of the late, and deeply lamented, former Clerk of the House of Representatives, John Andrews, who was born in my hometown of Salem, Mass.

Many deep associations on the Hill are formed as the result of long tedious work together on committees. GORDON and I did not have such an opportunity. Our relationship was a personal one that evolved into a deeper one with the passage of time. His life with its share of sorrows and blessings became sources of concern and delight for me as he faced different experiences.

He will be missed by all who knew him. He was most friendly, considerate, and cordial in his relations with others. Yet, he was of an independent mind and tenacious in his honest convictions. He was ever ready to listen to any contrary view but remained firm in his former belief if the arguments to the contrary were not persuasive. There will always be room, and there will always be a great need, for men in the Congress like GORDON CANFIELD.

It is my hope and prayer that he, his charming wife, Dorothy, and his family have many long years of health and happiness ahead. It would be a fitting reward for a man who gave too much of himself in an effort to serve his constituency and his country while he labored here.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR BALANCE OF THE WEEK

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to inquire of the distinguished majority leader as to the program for the balance of the week.

Mr. McCORMACK. There will be no legislative program for the balance of this week. We are going to meet every day at least until Thursday—I will not go beyond that—because there is a very important discharge petition on civil rights on the Clerk's desk, so that all Members, both Democrats and Republicans, will have an opportunity to sign the petition.

Mr. HOEVEN. May I inquire whether there will be a session on tomorrow?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; there will be a session on tomorrow, Wednesday, and Thursday.

Mr. HOEVEN. There will be no legislative business on tomorrow?

Mr. McCORMACK. There will be no legislative business for the balance of the week. Members may govern themselves accordingly. The important business is, if they are going to sign the discharge petition, they may have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOEVEN. May I inquire with reference to Tuesday for the reason a Republican conference is to be held in this Chamber at 2 o'clock. I hope we may have finished our business by that time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Every effort will be made to cooperate.

Mr. GROSS. What about the home rule petition; is that unimportant?

Mr. McCORMACK. No. All discharge petitions are important. I particularly refer to civil rights because President Eisenhower stressed it so strongly in his message on the state of the Union the other day. We would welcome at least 50 Republican Members signing the petition. At least that number would be welcome.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEVEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I want to find out who is entitled to credit for settling that steel strike.

THE LATE WILLIAM C. HULL

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on December 23 of last year, the United States lost one of its most competent and dedicated public servants with the death of William C. Hull, who had filled the post of executive assistant to the Civil Service Commissioners since October 18, 1917. Bill Hull, who served under 9 Presidents and 30 Civil Service Commissioners, became a true friend and trusted adviser to innumerable key Government officials and Members of Congress during his 52 years in Washington. I myself have counted Bill Hull among my close friends for many years.

Having started as a $360-a-year messenger in 1908, Bill Hull advanced rapidly, and was appointed executive assistant only 9 years later. His competence was matched only by his enthusiasm for his job. He turned down all suggestions that he accept some higher paid position with the statement: "I've loved my work, and I've never thought of changing or retiring."

Bill Hull's dedicated service did not go unnoticed. He gained countless friends and became generally known as "Mr. Civil Service." Washington veterans knew, and newcomers soon found out, that Bill Hull had the answers to all civil service questions. He received frequent, lavish, and deserved praise from superiors, colleagues, Members of Congress, and civic organizations, all of whom found him very agreeable to deal with, as well as absolutely authoritative.

In private life, Bill Hull was a very active and public spirited citizen of Arlington. He worked for the community chest and the Red Cross, and was secretary of the Leeway Citizens Association and past president of the Arlington Civic Federation. In addition, he was vice president of the Arlington Hospital Association at the time of his death.

Bill Hull's death leaves a gaping void in the lives of his family and of his many friends. It also leaves a memory, however, that will serve as an inspiration to future generations of Government employees.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS COMMISSION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to establish a Congressional Elections Commission composed of three members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. No more than two members of this Commission shall belong to the same political party and membership thereof shall be representative of the various geographical areas of the United States. Each member of the Commission shall be appointed for 9 years.

The Commission is authorized to make and maintain temporary and permanent registers of voters having qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of the State in which the congressional district is situated, to participate in primary, special, and general elections in the various congressional districts. Qualifications, however, shall be uniform for all persons and without regard to race, color, or national origin.

The Commission is authorized to conduct registration of voters pursuant to the act and to conduct primary, general, and special elections for the Senate and the House of Representatives, first, whenever requested by duly empowered officials of the State in which the congressional district is located, or, second, when the Commission determines that, unless such election is conducted by the Commission, persons having the qualifications requisite for electors for the most numerous branch of the legislature of the State in which the congressional district is situated are likely to be denied their right to vote in such primary, special, or general elections and to have their votes fairly counted.

Whenever the Commission conducts such election it shall be the sole primary, special, or general election for the congressional district for Members of the Senate and House of Representatives and shall be made without limitation by State, local laws or ordinances regarding elections, election procedures, and so forth, the results thereof to be final, subject only to adequate provision for judicial review of elections to protect the rights of all parties.

This legislation is identical to that introduced by Senators HART, MCNAMARA, and others. It is the only way to really guarantee full and adequate protection to all citizens of their right to vote in elections so essential to democracy.

Other measures pending will not attack the problem of guaranteeing citizens both the right to vote and their full civil rights so well or completely as this measure. Enactment of this bill will be the most significant advance possible in the field of civil rights and will make sure that citizens will have a right to vote in congressional and senatorial elections.

There is adequate basis in the Constitution and laws of the United States for this legislation. Elections to the Senate and House of Representatives are constitutionally the province of the Federal Government, and only by reason of inaction of the Federal Government and delegation of authority have been conducted by the States. Legislation of this sort was recommended by a substantial majority of members of the Civil Rights Commission, including some from the South.

In many States qualified voters are being denied the right to vote. Legislation of this sort is now imperative, 90 years after the adoption of the 15th amendment guaranteeing the rights of all citizens to vote without regard to race, color, or national origin. I intend to push vigorously for enactment of this legislation during this session of Congress and will seek to have it appended to the civil rights bill now pending before the Rules Committee when it comes to the floor for amendment and vote.

THE HONORABLE SAM RAYBURN AND THE HONORABLE LYNDON B. JOHNSON

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Speaker, the State of Texas was the host to the American Medical Association's national convention in Dallas December 1. On that day several thousand doctors from all States in the Union were welcomed by two distinguished Texans, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, the Speaker of the House, and the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Democratic leader of the Senate.

The speakers were presented by Dr. Louis M. Orr, president of the AMA. In his address, Speaker RAYBURN told the doctors that in all his experience in Congress he had "never seen a man or a woman in that Congress that would acknowledge or say that he or she was for socialized medicine."

The Speaker stated frankly, however, that he had been disturbed and had been a little bit out of humor over the term "socialized medicine," which, he added, "nobody can define."

"There are enough people in the House of Representatives and in the Senate who are opposed to these things to stop them always," he said, "but sometimes there has to be an alternative, and that is when we would like to sit down with you and discuss it with you."

The Speaker urged the doctors to speak for themselves and not through some "hired man" in appearances before congressional committees, because the committees and the House of Representatives "are the best juries that I have ever seen a person tried before."

Doctors, he said, should be more active in civic affairs and politics; should "study your Government" and strive to get better government, by getting "good men and women" elected at the polls.

The Speaker's address, which follows, was direct and the doctors gave him a tremendous ovation at its conclusion. Republican and Democratic doctors alike showered him with compliments on his forthrightness.

REMARKS TO THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION BY THE HONORABLE SAM RAYBURN, DALLAS, TEX., DECEMBER 1, 1959

Mr. Chairman, President Orr, Senator Johnson, and members of this great association, as was indicated here, I have been around quite a while. People have been good to me and I love them for it. Whether I have been good to them is a matter for them to decide. I am 39 past. I was never sick in my life, but if there was ever a place where I thought it would be fortunate to become ill it would be right here this morning.

How they would argue across my bed I don't know, but lawyers do that right across the table from each other.

I am happy to be here, and I am happy that you came to Texas.

LYNDON said something about long speeches, and I told him I would take a very few minutes. He said, "Well you said that one time and I was sitting there and you took 30 minutes."

I am glad to speak this morning. To tell the truth, I would rather speak before breakfast than after dinner. I go to many meetings where there is a head table with 30 or 40 people, and I would have to introduce all of them. Some of them want to make a speech, because sometimes there are a good many of their constituents there. Many times I have sat until 11 o'clock, and at that time of night your food is dead in your body, and physically and mentally you are numb.

I was very much interested in President Orr's remarks. I served on one committee in the Congress of the United States for 24 years, a very important one. I was chairman of it 5 years. When I became Speaker I gave up committees.

What we were searching for in that committee all the time was information, and there are groups that come before the committees that are the hardest people on earth to get any information out of because, in the case of these great big concerns, the men who have built those concerns up don't come; they hire some fellow who comes to make a speech to be published in the journal that comes out next to make them a reputation, and they give the committees of Congress little or no information.

Every time a man establishes the reputation of giving the committees of Congress meat when he comes there, he is listened to and he is always welcomed back.

I shouldn't say this because they have been too good to me, but the committees of the House of Representatives and the House of Representatives are the best juries that I have ever seen a person tried before. Those of us who have been there a long time and who love the institution want everybody that comes there to make good. They absolutely suspend judgment on them, give them a fair opportunity and a sympathetic hearing, and when they have had their opportunity, those who hear them are not off many percent in their judgment.

It is the same way with you gentlemen coming before the Congress of the United States. Come yourselves—don't send somebody—because if you do not understand the questions that affect medicine and its practice, some fellow sitting in an office somewhere can't understand it right quick.

I have been more or less disturbed and a little bit out of humor about some talk that has been going around the country for several years, people talking about something that nobody can define. I have served with more than 2,700 men and women since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives in a little more than 46 years. I have never seen a man or a woman in that Congress that would acknowledge or say that he or she was for socialized medicine. And yet sometimes there come out of Chicago documents accusing a whole party of being for socialized medicine.

The first time I talked to one of your presidents, Dr. Gunnar Gundersen, I believe I referred to this matter, and he said it is a wornout, frazzled-out term. He said, "I never have used it, and I never intend to."

There are enough people in the House of Representatives and in the Senate who are opposed to these things to stop them always, but sometimes there has to be an alternative, and that is when we would like to sit down with you and discuss it with you.

Medicine is not static, because when you are static you are not moving any way except backwards, and medicine, I will say to you, in my opinion has made great progress in the discovery and treatment of diseases in the last several years, greater discoveries in its field than any profession that I know anything about.

I am sorry that it is so hard for brilliant young men to get into medical schools. I don't know exactly why it is, but they write me all the time and ask me to give them a recommendation as to character because I have known their fathers and mothers, that they may establish a character to get into medical school.

I don't know what you are going to do about it. I don't know whether you have the teachers that are competent, whether you can get them together, whether you have the accoutrements, whether you have the rooms in these medical schools, to take in more pupils, but I say this to you, that I think something has got to be done about it. What it is I don't know. Maybe I need your advice about it.

The other sciences and the other professions are bidding high, very high, for the brilliant young men and young women who come out of our colleges and our universities, and they are going to take that line which is very attractive. It is very attractive in compensation—any of the sciences now are. I hope that out of this group of brilliant young men and women that are doctors there will be formed a program that will get these people to make doctors.

I have had something to do with doctors all my life. I had a brother who was a country and a town doctor. He went in a buggy or on horseback in the backland lanes of north Texas any time they called him. He didn't have any office hours, but he had a telephone, and they could get to him.

Of course, now you have got to take people to hospitals, if there are hospitals, and there are not enough of them, and many of your communities will not provide them.

I want to speak to you about another matter for a moment. I was happy that your president referred to it. Just the same as I said before about coming before the committees of Congress yourself, not by some hired man, the same thing applies to politics and government. Don't read and believe some leaf that comes to you, probably written by some prejudiced person. Most of them, of course, would be Republicans, but some of them might be Democrats. I do not free all Democrats from that category, either, because there are a few of them that I don't agree with on everything.

Time was when everybody was a politician. When this Government came into existence, the man on the farm, the man in the shop, the man in the office, was a politician. He knew something about it. We had a simple government, and I often marvel at what was done in Philadelphia in 4 short months, from May 1787 to September.

What would you think today if a group of men having to do with something that affected the people, a political issue, were to meet in a room like this, 59 of them, lock the doors, and not let a picture be taken in there or a stenographer be present or a radio or a television? They would say that they were trying to put something over on the people. But if it had not been for James Madison and his notes published 30 years after the convention adjourned, we would have had no history of the happenings in that convention.

They met there with the great Washington as their chairman, and somebody one time said that wherever George Washington sat, there was the head of the table. Thomas Jefferson quarreled with Alexander Hamilton across the desk from Washington for a time, but he said that when George Washington had the facts he had the most unfailing judgment of any man he had ever known.

They brought forth a document there, as I have said, in four short months, and it was done by young men, too.

There was one old man in the convention, and that was Benjamin Franklin. He was 81. The great lawyer, Wilson, from Pennsylvania, was 65. George Washington, covered with honors and gratitude by all the people, was 55. James Madison, known as the father of the Constitution, was 36. He came to that convention having read every constitution that had ever been written in any time before that. Alexander Hamilton was 30 years of age. A man named Pinkney from South Carolina came to that convention with a completed proposal for a constitution in his pocket. He was 29 years of age.

They had lived, they had studied, they had thought about politics and government.

I speak to thousands of young people every year. They come to Washington by the thousands, senior classes from high schools and colleges and universities, and one of the saddening things to me is that there are fewer good historians in the United States, even about United States history, than any other thing I know. I tell them, You should study United States history and government in the grade school, in the high school, in the college, in the university and in the rest of your life, and then you won't know too much about it.

You know, the great British statesman Gladstone said that our Constitution was the greatest document ever struck off at one time by the hand and brain of man. I agree with that a hundred percent.

Do you know something? Every time somebody starts out to do something for what I call "the folks" without demagoguery, somebody says, "You are pushing the country into socialism" or "You are changing our form of government."

The people of this country have been so wise that they have not changed that Constitution in its fundamentals one iota. The first 10 amendments known as the Bill of Rights were agreed upon by many of the leaders before all the colonies, the 13, ratified that Constitution, and since then it has been amended only 12 times. One of the amendments, the famous 18th amendment, has been repealed. Not one of those amendments affected one particle the principles written into our Constitution in 1787 because our fathers started out a new theory and a new practice in government.

Oh, the Greeks one time thought they were going to have a democracy. They called everybody in, and they tried to write laws and they found out that could not be done. A pure democracy wouldn't work. But these American men said, "We are going to have a democracy in a republic; we are going to have a representative democracy; we are going to fix it so that everybody doesn't go to a convention or a legislature, but we will fix it so that they can choose their representative to go to the legislatures and to the Congress and there represent them and write their laws."

If they are not pleased with that House Member they elect, they can take him out in 2 years. If they are not pleased with the President they can take him out in 4 years. If they are not pleased with a Senator they can take him out in 6 years.

They so arranged it that a third of the Senators come up for election each 2 years. That truly is what they dreamed and what they wrote, they made this a representative government.

Again I say to you, men of intelligence, men who have made their marks in their communities as you have, men who are trusted and men who are loved, if you will allow your constituents to love you, you can be a great force, a great influence for better government. What you have to do to get better government is to get good men and good women voted for and elected at the polls.

There are a lot of things I could talk to you about, but I do hope you study government. Do not take someone else's word for it. You are as smart and maybe smarter than they are.

I could talk about our international situation, about which I am considerably humiliated and disappointed. I know this, that if I run for office it does not do me any good to be second because I am never sworn into that office.

The Congress of the United States has appropriated billions to make us first, and we are not. We have some bickering among the various departments in Washington, in the Army and the Navy and the Air Corps. We thought we would stop that by passing a law that we thought was going to unify the services and maybe have one man at the head of it.

Of course, the President has the high responsibility over the Secretary of Defense. But there are still jealousies, there are still bickerings. I have been hoping that when we gave them all the money they asked for; gave them the kind of law they asked for, and put a man at the head of it who is supposed to be the head, that someday some man will get in there who will take these warring factions by the scruff of the neck and say, "Get together or get."

Well, I am happy to be with you. I say I have always liked doctors. I had the finest brother that ever lived who was a doctor. I think in all probability the doctor is the first man I ever saw, and I have been seeing them ever since. As I say, I have not needed them because I have never been sick in my life, and I can give you a prescription to give some of your folks, the greatest medicine in the world, and that is a reasonable amount of exercise, all the sunshine you can take, and all the rest you can take away from your labors.

When I am in Washington my burden is pretty heavy. I have 436 other fellows and women to deal with every day. Fifty of them are standing on the floor of the House clamoring for recognition at one time, and I have to study which one I am going to turn loose first, but the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives are just a cross section of the people of the United States who sent them. They are just as good and no better. They are supposed to express their will and their sentiments, and I say if they do not, they take them out every 2 years. But it is your responsibility, it is the responsibility of every citizen under the flag to go to the polls every opportunity he has and vote and elect men and women who will carry out your hopes, your aspirations, and your ambitions, and to rear a group of young men and women in this land whose shoulders will be broad enough, hearts big enough, minds keen enough to know this Government, to carry it on, to serve it, to protect it, and to perpetuate the finest and the freest government that ever blessed mankind.

PROPOSAL TO CANCEL GOVERNMENT BONDS

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. HIESTAND] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas has just remarked that we should cancel $15 billion worth of bonds now held by the Federal Reserve bank on the grounds that they had been paid for.

It is true that they have been paid for but by whom? They have been paid for by the Federal Reserve bank and are therefore owned by the Federal Reserve. If we had the authority to confiscate Federal Reserve funds why not confiscate the social security bonds and all other bonds owned by Federal agencies.

The Treasury does not own the bonds any more than it owns your bonds or my bonds or any workers' bonds or any insurance company's bonds.

It would be completely illegal and unconstitutional to confiscate these bonds.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 540 APPLIES MONROE DOCTRINE TO COMMUNIST SUBVERSION IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. HOSMER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday I introduced a joint resolution to forestall intervention, domination, control, and colonization by international communism in the New World. It has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs where I hope it will receive prompt consideration.

Under date of December 30, 1959, I wrote President Eisenhower requesting administration support for the joint resolution and asked him to endeavor to place a declaration of its doctrine on the agenda of the 11th meeting of American States. This meeting was originally scheduled for Quito, Ecuador, next month, but has since been postponed to an indefinite date.

Simply stated, the joint resolution does the following:

First. Recognizes the vital danger to all American nations of a direct or indirect intervention by international communism into any one of them.

Second. Reaffirms the Monroe Doctrine's warning to European nations to keep hands off the two American continents.

Third. Applies the Monroe Doctrine to international communism, whether operating openly or under subversive disguise.

Fourth. Labels any direct or indirect intervention by international communism anywhere in the New World as a danger to peace and security of all American states justifying immediate exercise of these nations' inherent right of self-defense.

Fifth. Authorizes immediate individual or collective self-defense action by the American nations to forestall subversive intervention by international communism anywhere in the Americas.

Sixth. Provides for an inter-American administration of any American nation so rescued from international communism pending restoration of a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Threats by international communism to leapfrog the Atlantic and take over countries of the Western Hemisphere both by infiltration of existing governments and by seizing control of liberal revolutionary movements constitutes a clear and present danger. The joint resolution embodies a program of action to meet that danger.

If the Communist efforts to control countries on the American Continents are not thwarted, the United States will become subject to destructive sneak attack from Red missile bases almost within sight of our own southern cities.

Communist regimes in the Caribbean, Central or South America, or any of them, would not alone imperil the United States and its American neighbors. By thus exposing the United States to attack from the south, the relative power of the free world and the Communist empire would be so drastically unbalanced that all Western nations and thus Western civilization itself could be overwhelmed and destroyed.

Each year hundreds of Latin Americans receive revolutionary training in Moscow and are sent back to work ceaselessly to subvert their lawful governments and replace them with regimes dominated and controlled by the international Communist conspiracy.

Their work is apparent today in Panama where our sovereignty over the vital canal is being harassed. The Cuban revolutionary movement daily evidences greater and greater subservience to agents of international communism. The cancer of communism in Latin America was exposed to world view in Peru where Vice President NIXON was mobbed and in Venezuela where he was stoned and spat upon.

The manipulations of international communism in the New World approach closer and closer to obvious intervention upon our continents.

For too long we, as a nation, have left the initiative to Communist enemies dedicated to our destruction. We have waited for their blows to fall, and then only improvised some hasty action to fend them off. In this atomic age only a few microseconds of attack warning may be available to defenders. They are far too short for us any longer to tolerate the possibility of military surprise from missile bases south of our borders controlled by international communism.

This Nation must develop, enunciate, and pursue forthright and effective policies within the inter-American peace structure that will actually keep international communism off the American Continents. In asking for prompt congressional and prompt administration action on the doctrine of the joint resolution, I am seeking U.S. initiative and action to stop the Reds now, before it is too late. Unless we do so, we permit the stage to be set for a series of Red "back door" takeovers that eventually could engulf not only the Americas, ourselves, but the entire free world as well.

It is our duty to act now and to act decisively to forestall this threat.

It is in our tradition of initiative to achieve and preserve freedom begun in 1776 that we do so.

It is possible for us so to act wholly within the framework of accepted international law and principles.

The joint resolution was carefully drafted with that duty, that tradition, and that possibility in mind. It was conceived by Prof. Samuel Flagg Bemis, Yale University, an outstanding historian and authority on diplomatic relations of the Americas.

The joint resolution incorporates and extends to present facts and situations a long series of inter-American diplomatic policies and declarations from the Monroe Doctrine of 1823 onward.

As did the Monroe Doctrine at its announcement, so today this new doctrine might well boldly symbolize the decisive leadership and firm determination by the United States that alone can forward President Eisenhower's magnificent crusade for peace and friendship in freedom.

Rooted basically in the Monroe Doctrine declaring any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their systems to any portion of the Western Hemisphere as dangerous to U.S. peace and safety, the joint resolution also draws on article 51 of the United Nations Charter recognizing the inherent right of national self-defense and upon inter-American treaties and diplomatic precedents.

The joint resolution spells out clearly what has not been clear before. Namely, that intervention in an American state by international communism is not a mere internal matter pertaining to the victim nation alone, and thus subject to the good-neighbor policy's inhibition against interference by one American state in the internal affairs of another. The joint resolution recognizes and declares that in law as well as in fact such action constitutes a foreign intervention prohibited by the Monroe Doctrine. As such, it is clearly labeled by the joint resolution as a threat to peace and security, and thus subject to counter-intervention and restoration of a free government to the people.

A corollary to the Monroe Doctrine was announced in 1859 by President Grant prohibiting transfer of any existing European New World colonies between them, lest such transfer upset the balance of power against the security of the United States.

Implementation of this corollary by the American states when Hitler's armies overran Europe furnishes precedent for a portion of the joint resolution. In 1939 the American foreign ministers announced there would be no recognition of German claims to occupied countries' New World colonies. In July 1940 Congress enacted a joint resolution carrying out the foreign ministers' pronouncement. Later, in 1940, the foreign ministers met again, at Havana, and gave a mandate to any one or more of the American Republics on their own initiative to step in, act quickly, and forestall any attempted German takeovers. By convention they also provided for an inter-American committee to administer the rescued territory pending restoration of a free government. These "prompt action" and "provisional government" precedents are found in the joint resolution.

Postwar, by 1947, the need became apparent for orderly procedures to meet certain new dangers to the sovereignty and political independence of American states. These dangers were, first, aggression from each other, or from outside the continent, which is not an armed attack, and second, any other fact or situation that might disturb the peace of the Americas. Based on the self-defense provisions of article 51 of the United Nations Charter, appropriate procedures were adopted for consultation through the Organization of American States, to be followed by such action as might be decided upon by two-thirds agreement. They were made part of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance signed at Rio de Janeiro in 1947, commonly known as the Rio Pact.

The joint resolution incorporates the Rio Pact's acknowledgement that aggression may exist even though it is not in the form of armed attack, and its acknowledgment that other facts or situations also may exist which are dangerous to American peace.

The joint resolution also takes cognizance of the declaration of Washington, 1951, and the declaration of Caracas, 1954, which characterize direct or indirect intervention of international communism in any American state as constituting colonization by a non-American power and thus a violation of its sovereignty and political independence.

However, the joint resolution rejects as inadequate to cope with present dangers the Rio Pact's cumbersome procedure of meeting, deciding, and ratifying a course of action by two-thirds of the foreign ministers of the American states. Delay in forestalling intervention by international communism might well be fatal. Realistically recognizing this, the joint resolution returns to the 1940 Havana precedents for a legal basis for immediate forestalling action to be taken before, not after the fact. It also is this Havana precedent upon which I have based my request to the President to place the joint resolution's doctrine before the Quito Conference in February.

The foregoing review—from the Monroe Doctrine onward—of 137 years of decisive and effective action by the American Republics to protect themselves from dangers from without presents a clear pattern of developing and extending basic policies to meet new and altered threats. It also presents a precedent, a basis in law and an inspiration for equally courageous and intelligent action today. To that end I seek U.S. action both by the Congress and by the President to implement the doctrine of the joint resolution.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 540

Joint resolution to forestall intervention, domination, control and colonization by international communism in the New World and for other purposes

Whereas the intervention of international communism directly or indirectly in an American republic would constitute a fact or situation threatening the sovereignty and political independence of the states of the entire New World; and

Whereas the American continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, have long since ceased to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power or powers; and

Whereas the intervention of international communism, directly or indirectly, or however disguised, in any American state, would be in effect such a colonization by a non-American power or powers, and would violate the sovereignty and political independence of an American state; and

Whereas such a fact or situation extended to any portions of this hemisphere would be dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States and the American continents; and

Whereas in the rapidly developing contingencies of the atomic age there might not be time to assemble a meeting of the Inter-American Organ of Consultation to provide for joint action to repel the danger, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States hereby Resolve, That if such a fact or situation should present a sudden emergency, then any one or more of the high contracting parties to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance would be justified, in the exercise of individual or collective self-defense under article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, in taking steps to forestall intervention, domination, control, and colonization by international communism in the New World.

In case of such defensive measures having been taken by the defending state or states, it or they should report to the Inter-American Organ of Consultation, to the end that an emergency committee, after the manner provided by the Convention of Havana of 1940, be set up for the provisional administration of the state thus defended, pending its restoration to a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Just 2 days ago a violent attack both upon the proposed joint resolution and me was made by the semiofficial Cuban newspaper Revolucion. This quick and violent opposition to a proposal to keep international communism from leapfrogging the Atlantic has but two interpretations. Either it stems from irresponsible oblivion to the dangers of Communist infiltration and subversion in the Americas, or, it represents the official Communist negative reaction to any proposal to thwart its aggressive designs on the New World.

Both the dialectic in which the Cuban newspaper's verbal attack was couched and the quick heat with which it was made reveals the Castro regime has been hit at a sensitive, vulnerable spot. No American nation fears or objects to the Monroe Doctrine's warning to European nations to keep hands-off American countries. None should fear or object to applying the same warning specifically to international communism operating under subversive disguises.

The source of this attack on the joint resolution is an argument for its prompt passage as well as cumulative evidence of a degree of non-Cuban control and domination of that nation's originally liberal revolutionary movement.

STRIKING AT THE TRUTH IN THE STEEL SETTLEMENT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I have taken this time to share with my colleagues some of our feelings and thoughts about the settlement of the steel strike—not from the viewpoint of the terms per se of the settlement, but rather from the viewpoint that the political claims and overtones flowing from the resolution of the strike are patently misleading and, indeed, unfortunate. The steelworkers and the steel union settled and won the strike, and nobody else. But it could have been done so much earlier with so much less cost and suffering except for the unyielding stubbornness of management and a national leadership willing to play politics with our economic welfare.

Perhaps I can best sum up my views by saying it is another striking example of a leadership which is willing to take the second-best course and is attempting to offset this by claiming singular or first-class accomplishments.

Let me say at this point that I believe that the important thing in this election year is not to place before the American people a false, shallow image, but rather to make sure that the American people realize that if they are willing to accept second-best decisions, they will be placing their stamp of approval on a policy of assuring that as a nation we will be second best, instead of best, in virtually everything. I am not willing to accept this second-best philosophy of doing things along the lines of least resistance, and I join my colleagues who feel as I do in fighting against approaches, programs, and concepts of leadership which will have America assuming a second-best posture. We will document this in many fields in the weeks to come.

The steel strike was an example of what I mean. It took place in a basic industry affecting the vitals of the American economy. And it would have been logical, at the outset, for the administration to have acted resolutely and with real leadership. We were faced with the fact months ago that the leadership was failing to evaluate the facts for the American public. To be sure, figures were furnished. However, publishing cold, impersonal figures without proper analysis and application does not do the job of qualitative leadership the American people have a right to expect, and which was certainly demanded in this needlessly drawn out labor-management dispute.

The administration had wittingly or unwittingly given the steel industry its main propaganda weapon behind which it hid—the false issue of inflation, unexplained. And, indeed, the administration's priority push in 1959 for harsh, restrictive labor legislation, in which it met with success, no doubt stiffened the determination of the steel industry. The industry undoubtedly thought that organized labor had been discredited enough for the public to view labor's leadership proposals with lack of sympathy and even suspicion, and that this attitude had likewise seeped down into the pores of the union workers in the steel plants.

This, of course, did not happen. When the fact became crystal clear from polls both by management and the union that the striking union members supported the union leadership, then the settlement was achieved, at a cost to the steel companies much greater than would have been the case if an earlier settlement had been concluded—as witness the Kaiser settlement. Some of you may have read the story in the Washington Evening Star of January 10, 1960, by correspondent Lee M. Cohen.

Not only did the stubbornness of management prove ill advised, but this stubbornness was dramatically costly to the workers involved in the shutdown, and also to thousands of others affected by it, especially small business concerns.

There is a truism in labor-management relations that we should not overlook or slight in our thinking. It is this: A labor union, in negotiating a perishable item, that is, the daily wages and working conditions of men and women, never gets more, however arrived at, than the strength the union commands. And if this truism is recognized, then I think it becomes patently clear that the situation is being twisted in an effort to give the steel settlement a political flavor to enrich certain political fortunes. Let no one be misled that the United Steelworkers of America was handed a favorable decision on a silver platter by certain men in public life. It would, in my opinion, be a grave error for union members themselves and the public in general to fall into such a pattern of thinking.

Yet, no one can deny that a well-planned effort has been made, and will continue to be made, to give, as I have said, a political flavor to enrich certain political fortunes. And I cannot help but believe, Mr. Speaker, that when the public realizes that a great national dispute involving a great national industry was so unashamedly maneuvered, at a high sacrifice to the Nation, that the ultimate effect will be public resentment against such a second-rate leadership job.

Mr MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I am happy to yield to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the gentleman from California for the statement he is making in regard to the political propaganda over who should take credit for settling the steel strike.

The minds of the American public must well remember the pleas of the steel union leaders 6 months ago for the President to appoint a factfinding board so the public would know the true facts involved. Ex-Secretary of the Treasury George Humphrey, George Allen, and other steel officials were advising the White House to not interfere with negotiations that were completely one sided. Six months ago Big Steel was spearheading the drive to starve out the workers. They thought that after 116 days plus 80 days under Taft-Hartley injunction the steelworkers would gladly accept the company's last offer when the election took place. By December steel management realized the steelworkers were solid behind their union.

I recall when I went home after the Congress adjourned I attended a mass meeting of steelworkers in my district on Labor Day. I was told then that pressure was being brought to bear on the families of the steelworkers to urge a back-to-work movement in the steel industry. Millions and millions of dollars were spent in the newspapers, magazines, radio, and television to cause the families of the steelworkers to accept the companies' last offer after the Taft-Hartley law was invoked.

They were making fair progress on this until the steelworkers over the Nation realized the terrific pressure that was being brought to bear to defeat and ruin their union in this negotiation fight.

I will tell you when the steel strike was really settled. It was not Vice President NIXON, it was not the Secretary of Labor that settled the steel strike; it was the steelworkers themselves that brought about the settlement of the steel strike.

It started when Orville Kincaid, the subdistrict director of northern Indiana Steelworkers Union, called a mass meeting at Memorial Hall in Gary, Ind. David MacDonald spoke at this mass meeting. There were over 5,000 steelworkers in that hall. A vote was taken on accepting the companies' last offer. Out of the approximately 5,000 steelworkers in the hall, 3 steelworkers stood up in favor of accepting the companies' last offer.

Then is when management was convinced that the steelworkers were going to stick by their union and support their union in its fight for a fair contract involving wages and working conditions.

Let me say this, I only wish the Vice President and the White House had come into the picture last August. It would have saved thousands of steelworker families the privations and suffering they went through during this period of time.

I am glad to hear the gentleman from California take the floor today and outline the real, true facts regarding the steel labor dispute. I really believe that after the landslide vote was taken in Gary, Ind., that the companies' last offer was going to be rejected, right then is when it was decided by big steel to get the Republican candidate for President into the picture.

The White House and the Republican National Committee may think that this political strategy may offset their all-out support for the Landrum-Griffin bill of last session.

Millions of workers throughout the Nation, especially steelworkers, cannot forget the lobbying pressures by the White House and members of the President's Cabinet preliminary to the votes on the Landrum-Griffin legislation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield very briefly?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I am always happy to yield to my friend very briefly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If what the gentleman from Indiana says is factual, and I assume it is, and we are very near neighbors over in the Methodist Building and have been for years, I cannot understand why the Democratic Party and its spokesmen make so much fuss over this attempt to claim credit due, it has been said, to a Republican candidate. You just give it publicity in arguing about it—create the implication that a Republican really did settle the steel strike. Some of us, myself, for example, did not know that our candidate for Vice President, Mr. Mitchell, had settled that strike. Now you come along and are denying something that I have never heard charged. Or did I hear or read something to that effect? Of course, I have not been around all the time.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I want to thank my friend, the gentleman from Michigan. I am quite sure the gentleman from Michigan is in the very, very small minority, if he did not know or hear about it.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Indiana, who certainly, of all the people I know, is probably the most expert witness of the truth of what he just said.

In actuality, of course, the politicians did not dictate the terms of the settlement though they are willing to give this impression. If accepted as fact, this might, at a later time, be used as a bad or ill-advised precedent, because political or leadership responsibility is not to assume the actual task of settling the terms of a dispute but to assume the responsibility to see that collective bargaining really works.

As a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, I feel we should strive to work for an improved system of labor-management relations. This cannot come about when national leadership is turned off and on for short-term political advantage to the detriment of a long-term national proposition.

Mr. Speaker, a nation is no more outwardly strong than the true sum of its inner strength. Let the day never come when we or our children will say "it might have been different if only we had known." Our people do not want to be second best to anyone in anything. Our duty, with the help of others, is to be sure they can know in time to do something about it in 1960.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker and Members of the Congress, first I want to announce for those who do not know it that I am a member of Local No. 1272 of the United Steelworkers of America. In 1936 I helped to organize the steelworkers of America.

Who settled the 1959–60 steel strike?

In Washington we hear of many claiming credit for this—and in the papers and over the airways names are being dropped continuously.

Actually the answer is very simple, but very few have mentioned it at all.

The 500,000 members of the United Steelworkers of America settled the strike.

The wives of those steelworkers—like the wives of the mineworkers of former years—stood by their husbands, encouraged them, recognized the need for united action in order to maintain job security in the mills, and managed to feed and clothe their families for the duration of the strike. These women cooperated 100 percent with their husbands in the struggle for principles.

The elected officials of the local unions are to be commended too, for they kept their members informed of the facts, aware of the pitfalls, and united to the last man. They proved, by their leadership and their help, that they were worthy of the confidence the members had placed in them.

The district directors and their staffs never hesitated in assisting the local unions in their districts and were available at all times to cooperate and counsel when needed, and they served as a direct line to the international offices in specific instances.

And last, but not least, the international leadership, under the direction of McDonald, Hague, and Abel—these men awakened the public in general as to the real issue of the strike, not inflation, but "work rules and job security."

These are the people who settled the steel strike.

Management, in its effort to "inform the public of the facts," did not hesitate to spend millions of dollars. They took full-page advertisements in the Nation's newspapers, their financially sponsored newscasts never hesitated to slant certain angles of the news, both on TV and the radio. They invested heavily in propaganda.

Management even went to the membership of the union with "personal letters" in which they said they wanted "our workers to have the true facts."

The leaders of industry knew there was a difference of opinion within the union, and they did their best to capitalize on that difference. They maligned the international leaders of the union, they agitated at local union levels, they even tried to promote a back-to-work movement by the wives. All of this, however, was to no avail.

They were not successful in their attempt to brainwash either the public or the membership of the union.

What management did not know or realize was that, although a new generation of steelworkers now comprised the membership of the union, most of the present-day members are sons of former steelworkers and former mineworkers, and their wives come from union homes, too.

The leaders of industry did not count on the solid front they found in the union. They did not know that today's union membership recognized the old saying of "solidarity forever, our union makes us strong" just as fervently as did their fathers and uncles in the yesteryear.

They were so wrong, these men of management, in underestimating the strength of the union and the loyalty of the members.

Starting last June, before the contract had expired and before the strike was called, Messrs. McDonald, Hague, and Abel asked President Eisenhower to appoint an impartial board to investigate the facts on both sides of the dispute and make the facts public. The President refused their request then and again in September and in October.

Mr. Blough, of the United States Steel Corp., had continually stated that he wanted no interference from "an uninterested third party," and so the President agreed to let "collective bargaining follow its normal course."

However, when the Taft-Hartley Act was finally invoked and a board of inquiry was appointed by injunction, there was no objection by Mr. Blough or the other members of industry. But that board could not do the impossible; it was not able to move the immovable Mr. Cooper and his associates, for they believed they could destroy the union.

For some reason industry and management still felt very confident that once the men returned to the mills and work they would remain there; they would not want go out again, nor would their families permit them to do so. The negotiating team for industry was sure that with the secret vote the leaders of the union would be repudiated and the companies' last offer would be gladly accepted.

The union sent out a sample vote ballot and the industry did a little checking of its own, too. The companies were amazed with the outcome of their survey. The men in the mills were overwhelmingly with the union leadership and they were going to refuse the last offer.

So the companies were forced to do, in January, what they had refused to do last June—they turned to the Government for help. I think it safe to say that in order to save face they appealed for intervention by a third party.

Who settled the steel strike?

The dues-paying members of the United Steelworkers of America, with the help of their wives and families and their faith in their union leadership—that is who settled the strike.

Now let us all join in singing "Men of Steel."

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank my colleague.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes; I will yield for a short question.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Just one little question. It is somewhat like a hypothetical question. I understand you have intimated that politics has been injected into this settlement.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I did not intimate it. I meant to say it frankly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That stimulates my perhaps inactive mind. I have not finished the question. Recalling that in what was thought to be a somewhat tight campaign the Democratic Party received from John L. Lewis $850,000, my question is: Is there anything unusual about politics or politicians or labor leaders becoming involved in labor disputes in an election year?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I will say to the gentleman that the circumstances are quite different. I am sure if we go back to ancient history we could go on for some time, and I would rather talk about the present.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes? The answer is obvious.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I would like to yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT], also a member of the committee.

Mr. DENT. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

I join my colleagues today only to make a few observations on the implications of the steel settlement insofar as they affect the American way of life.

We are happy to see the steelworkers back at work and more than happy to know that it means a little more of life's comforts for the steelworker and his family.

No one can take away from the workers the credit for their victory. It was an example of sacrifice and courage. No one makes money during a strike and yet, even the most severe critic must admit that the high standard of American wages has been set through the process of collective bargaining which has had to resort to the strike procedure in almost every breakthrough to higher ground in our national scale of living.

However, this is no time to review the history of the American labor movement or the trials and tribulations of the men who have headed the historical strikes and negotiations of the past two generations.

It is sufficient to say that Dave McDonald was faced with one of the toughest situations in our recent labor-relations history.

The steel strike, either by design or accident, came hard on the heels of the greatest expose against labor unions in our entire history. For months, the public had been hammered with stories of corruption, wrongdoing, malpractice and almost everything that would tend to create the belief that labor leaders were selfish, arrogant, crooked, detestable and un-American.

Congress, always willing to be reelected, and seeking the popular side of an issue, overwhelmingly passed the Landrum-Griffin version—the Kennedy labor reform bill.

In the face of all this public reaction against labor unions, fomented by the McClellan committee activities, McDonald and the steelworkers ran into a stonewall attitude on the part of steel management who had worked up a program based upon the expediency of the moment.

This program was aimed at cutting the heart out of all future labor contracts. The fight was based upon an attempt to take away from the unions any right to discuss, negotiate or in any way interfere with work rules, layoffs, job changes, production quotas, age limits, seniority preferences in job selections and others heretofore subjects of labor-management relations.

This was not a single effort on the part of the steel companies. It was and is part of a well conceived, well financed plan of action by organized management that extends beyond the borders of this great country.

Following are just a couple of stories out of Business Week, November 28, 1959, issue:

DU PONT SUBSIDIARY IN ARGENTINA SETTLES STRIKE WITH 30 PERCENT

A U.S. chemical subsidiary lost a lot of production this fall when it got caught in a crossfire between the Argentine Government and labor. The uproar quieted down this week, and output has resumed.

President Frondizi's regime is committed to holding the line against inflationary wage increases. Last June, when employees of Ducilo S. A. du Pont's synthetic fiber producer, demanded wage increases, the company offered a 30 percent across-the-board raise, if accompanied by changes in work practices that would increase productivity.

The union refused the productivity demand but did not strike until September, when 2,500 workers went out as part of the general textile strike called by the Argentine textile workers union to protest government economic policies. Before the strike, slowdowns practically paralyzed the company.

The Argentine Government ordered the Ducilo workers to negotiate an agreement, but union leaders refused to show up for mediation meetings. The Minister of Labor then declared the strike illegal.

Last month Ducilo dismissed the workers. When the company started recruiting a new labor force strikers lit bonfires on roads to the plant, stoned buildings, and attacked job applicants.

Later in the same issue we read this:

British labor's campaign for a shorter workweek (Business Week, Nov. 7, 1959, p. 138) moved forward on one front this week but got stopped cold on another.

Ford Motor Co., Ltd., agreed to cut the work week from 42 to 41½ hours without loss of earnings. The company refused to grant a third week of vacation with pay and asked the union to cooperate in getting better output and workshop discipline.

In contrast, the shipbuilding industry turned down union demands, saying labor had not shown readiness to eliminate restrictive labor practices.

In the past, the industry, threatened with a strike, has given in to labor demands. This time, observes believe management will be adamant.

You will note the parallel lines in the situation here, in Argentina, and in England. Governments, holding what they call the line against inflationary wage increases, management dealing for complete control over production, hours, quotas, and so forth.

It appears that American producers who have moved into foreign countries are going to use their concessions in other countries to break down the American standards of labor-management relations as we know them to be.

If Big Steel could succeed in their organized plan to take the unions out of management practices where they affected the welfare of the union member, then it would not be long before the union member awakened to the practical fact that his union membership was more of an honorary membership than a forceful, mutually beneficial association of fellow workers.

With laws pertaining to minimum wages, maximum hours, unemployment compensation, injured workmen's compensation, social security, retirement benefits, unfair labor practices plus Walsh-Healey, Taft-Hartley, Davis-Bacon, and the Landrum-Griffin statutes, a labor union has only wages and working conditions to really bargain for.

If management can get a few more Federal laws on seniority, vacations, maximum pay schedules to hold the imaginary inflation line and then get the steel companies' formula on production practices about the only thing the unions will have left will be the right to hold a parade on Labor Day.

While all of this was going on, the public knew little of the terrific pressures McDonald and his steelworkers were under. Almost every medium of public expression was yelling for a settlement at any price—preferably the company version.

Men in the labor movement, members and officers alike, know the hard facts behind the strike. They knew that the wage issue was secondary to the issue on fundamental jurisdiction on work practices.

Knowing this, the workers suffered great personal financial hardship with a strike of over 3½ months. In my extension of remarks, I expect to cover this more fully.

Then came the tussle of overinvoking the compulsory work clause of Taft-Hartley. The companies finally won the court tests and the workers were ordered back to work.

In the meantime, the company position started to disintegrate and more and more of the producing companies started individual negotiations with McDonald and the steelworkers.

Seeing their position slipping away from them, the steel companies had to have a graceful way out.

Lo and behold, America woke up one fine morning and found the strike settled. Who settled it? Who pulled the miracle? Who was the genius who got the union a raise and made the steel companies back down?

According to radio, TV, and the press, it was none other than the Republican candidate for President of the United States—the country, not the steel company—RICHARD NIXON, that great broken-political-field runner whose training in California politics running against Helen G. Douglass and his wit-matching episode with Nikita Khrushchev and his ability to dodge Venezuelan hecklers made him a qualified negotiator in a situation such as this, particularly in an election year.

How did he settle this great issue? Well, according to the TV broadcast last Thursday morning that I listened to, he did it by "laying the cards" on the table and pointing out what would happen to both labor and management if they did not sign before Congress passed some sort of a labor bill, probably an antitrust, compulsory arbitration, and a prohibitive measure against strikes in so-called basic industries.

In the face of this kind of a threat and the political advantage that would accrue to their candidate, the steel companies backed up—to a well prepared fortification in the rear—and signed up.

Labor, of course, was jubilant and McDonald won his point without losing a man.

Some partisan politicians are condemning labor for allowing the Republican candidate to grab all the glory in this great strike settlement. However, that was before McDonald disclosed that the father of the announced Democratic candidate, Senator KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, had also played a very important behind-the-scenes part in the negotiations.

This made it nonpartisan, but it did not wipe out the grave and serious precedent set by the front page stories that could establish a new basis for settlement and negotiation in labor disputes.

I agree with McDonald of the steel union when he said "everybody likes a little help," and I also agree and applaud the help given by both NIXON and Mr. Kennedy.

But he might have been following the advice given years ago to a young man, who is in this room today, when he was seeking election to an executive position in a large international union. The only man who had enough votes to elect him was particularly and personally obnoxious to this individual. And, he did not want to seek his help. However, in speaking to an oldtime labor leader who had been successful in his own field for many years, he was given this advice. He said, "Whether you like the man or not has nothing to do with it, because in getting the election that you are after, you will be able to do some good. So, my advice to you is, deal with the devil to win, then kick the devil out." He might have been listening to that advice.

The point I want to make though is that, if the basis of the settlement was the fear of congressional action and the threat by a high Government official, that unless an agreement was reached, reprisals in the form of abusive or restrictive legislation would be invoked, then sirs, we have drifted a long way from free enterprise and free labor.

I would be first to applaud a settlement of a strike, but by the same token, I would be the first to condemn the injection of governmental threats as a common practice in labor disputes.

We would soon get the same kind of labor relations that Russia and other freedom-suppressing nations have if the elected officials in this Government of ours can threaten any labor organization with reprisals by law and force a settlement with any industry. Today, yes, according to all that we hear, labor has gained a point. Tomorrow they may lose a point. This is not the kind of negotiation where threats ought to be made by anybody.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] for yielding to me and also for obtaining this time to comment upon the settlement of the steel strike.

Mr. Speaker, I think it might be well to review the fact that the President repeatedly over a period of 106 days said that "we have got thoroughly to test out and use the method of free bargaining." Through those 106 days the steel strikers each lost an average of about $2,000, for what he thought was his economic right.

Now, I ask you if the steel companies themselves lost anything during those 106 days, and I will let the financial reports of the steel companies and the Wall Street Journal tell the story of their year's profits for 1959. I think you will find out that those profits as related in the Wall Street Journal will show you that the steel companies did not lose money in 1959, due to the accelerated production of steel in the first 6 months of 1959 and due to the monopolistic control of steel prices. If I buy a steel beam from the Kaiser company at Fontana, 60 miles from my home in Los Angeles, I pay the same price for it that I pay for the same type of steel beam that comes from Pittsburgh. You can call it monopoly, you can call it Pittsburgh plus, f.o.b., or anything you want, but the fact remains that there is a managed price in the steel industry which has brought to them the greatest profits that they have ever had in the history of their operation. In 1959, when they only operated at 58 percent of capacity, they made more profits than they made in any previous peacetime year, and they did not cut their price one dime. Under your old law of supply and demand, when your supply becomes plentiful, you cut prices so that you can get bigger distribution in the market, but this does not seem to hold true in the steel companies.

I want to compare the President's position that "we must not interfere with free collective bargaining in the steel strike," when he waited for 106 days while the steel companies and the wholesalers made extraordinary profits on their inventories, and the steelworkers suffered a loss, with the shipping strike where, in exactly 6 days after the shipping workers went on strike, the President invoked the Taft-Hartley Act. Six days in one instance, while he was talking about free collective bargaining, and 106 days in the other. I would like to have someone explain the consistency of the President's position in letting free collective bargaining work for 106 days in one instance and then preventing it from working after 6 days in another instance.

There is a very simple answer to that. The steel companies were not hurting during those 106 days, but you cannot stockpile shipping services. The shipping firms were hurting. That is the basic difference between invoking the Taft-Hartley Act in the case of the shipping strike and not doing it in the case of the steel strike. In my opinion, this shows the completely hypocritical position of the administration.

Now there is the question of who settled the strike. That is going to be dwelt upon at length today. We know the newspapers gave two gentlemen who may be the presidential and vice presidential candidates of the Republican Party the credit for settling this strike. The newspapers are owned by Republicans and you can expect that.

I happened to ride back from Los Angeles—I think it was on the third day of January—on the same plane that carried the candidate for president of the Republican Party. The plane made a world's record of 3 hours and 39 minutes. What did the headlines say? The headlines did not carry the fact that the Boeing 707 jet made a world's record of 3 hours and 39 minutes. It carried the fact that the Vice President of the United States was riding on the plane that made the record. This is just a foretaste of what you are going to have all during 1960. Every instant, every event will be twisted to a headline in favor of the presidential candidate on the Republican ticket.

The real fact is that a poll was taken just before the settlement of the steel strikers and 96 percent of them said that they were going out on strike when the Taft-Hartley period was over.

The next thing is that certain people do not want a strike in 1960, because that is an election year and it will not set well with the people of the United States to have the theme of peace and prosperity disturbed. So undoubtedly there was some pressure upon Mr. Blough and some of the other gentlemen of the steel companies. But I want you to note very carefully that Mr. Blough and others said that, "We do not have any present plans to raise steel prices." No; they will not raise prices, in my opinion, until after the election in November. And then you are going to get your steel price rises. Do not think for a minute that you are not going to get them.

I advise any of my friends who want to read something good, to look at the January 7 edition of the Christian Science Monitor, an article entitled "Steel Executives Scowl at Contract." In one of the paragraphs it says:

> In fact, it now is pretty obvious that the companies have signed new contracts at a price that would have brought settlements much sooner, and without a strike.

That is the real guts of the situation. One of the senior Senators on the other side of the Capitol quoted a noted commentator as follows:

> The strike was not settled by free bargaining. It was settled by a political fix.

Mr. Lippmann was the commentator and his complete article is worth reading.

The American people are not going to be fooled in 1960, in my opinion, by the Madison Avenue publicity men.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I thank my colleague from California.

May I say in conclusion that so far as I am concerned the important thing for us to remember from this steel strike is not just a negative attitude but a positive attitude. There can be no question that there is a serious problem that faces the Nation to improve management-labor relations with respect to collective bargaining.

I think the important thing to remember is that if we go into this or settle this on the basis of threats or on the basis of political advantage we will be doing our country a tremendous disservice. If, on the other hand, we can approach management-labor and Government's part in these proceedings from the point of view of bringing the machinery up to date in order that it may match machinery created in other countries, and achieve greater productivity in our country, more efficiency, and a higher standard of living, then I think we will have done our job for future generations.

BOMBING ATTACKS ON SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. IKARD). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ADDONIZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge once again that the Congress recognize the fact that our Nation's most basic and sacred principles are being challenged and threatened by the continuing predilection of an increasingly insolent lunatic fringe to settle differences of opinion by dynamite.

According to an excellent study that was published jointly by the American Friends Service Committee, the National Council of the Churches of Christ, and the Southern Regional Council, 30 homes, 4 schools, 7 churches, 4 Jewish temples, and a YWCA building were bombed in the South during the period from 1955 to 1959. In addition, there were a few bombings in the North, several unsuccessful bombing attempts in the South, and an epidemic of macabre bombing hoaxes throughout the country. The study does not include the most recent outrages, such as the bombing of the Little Rock school board last September. The sickening outbreak of swastika signs on synagogues in Germany and in the United States within the holiday season—when the spirit of good will toward men should be strongest—underscores the gravity of current conditions.

It is obvious that we are dealing with more than just a few isolated outbursts of madness. We are dealing with a small but determined group that seeks to introduce alien methods into the political and social life of America. Our Nation is deeply committed to the precept that controversies among ourselves can and must be solved peaceably within our legal framework, in which reason prevails. This precept is now being challenged by men who are contemptuous of the law and bereft of reason. They know that they cannot convince the reasonable and the civilized with their wild, incoherent harangues. Consequently they have decided to attack civilization itself with the most destructive weapon at their disposal: dynamite.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no other logical explanation for these attacks on schools and houses of worship. Such buildings are symbolic of the very essence of our civilization. The barbarians who attack them are on their way down to the level of totalitarian bully boys whose favorite hobby is the desecration of cemeteries.

The ominous nature of the destructive crimes under discussion is in itself enough to make these acts a matter of national concern. There are, however, more concrete reasons for Federal intervention. In the first place, dynamite is not an item that is likely to be readily available in most communities. It may be safely assumed that the perpetrators of the bombing crimes bring their dynamite in from remote sources, and that the explosives cross at least one State line before they reach their target. We do not permit dope to circulate freely in this country; there is no reason to be any more complacent where dynamite is concerned.

In the second place, police have found that many of the bombings are the work of dynamite experts. The conclusion is inescapable that these merchants of destruction travel from State to State in the pursuit of their evil objectives.

Nevertheless, it has been said that Federal intervention is unnecessary since the States are capable of handling the problem without Washington's assistance. Unfortunately, the record does not support this point of view. The wave of major and minor bombing incidents that started in 1954 shows few, if any, signs of abating. It is difficult to say whether local measures have been halfhearted or inept; the fact remains that they have been largely ineffective. There have been few indictments and even fewer convictions. In many instances, there is overwhelming evidence of police laxity. The record shows, for instance, that the home of a Southern lady, who had the audacity to suggest publicly that extremism might not be the only approach to race relations, was three times the target of bombing attacks in a period of four days. The first two bombs failed to explode, but the third bomb did severe damage to the lady's home. It is impossible to believe that this depravation could not have been prevented if local authorities had been adequately vigilant. It is also difficult to understand why there were no convictions in this case and in so many other cases.

The bombing epidemic is not confined to the criminals who actually put their evil theories into practice. On the fringes, there are countless shadowy figures with wicked or warped minds who perpetrate bombing hoaxes in order to disrupt classes, break up religious services, and to spread fear and terror. They, too, must be stopped.

It is up to the Congress to take the lead in ending the bombing epidemic and all its side effects. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that H.R. 465, which I introduced during the first session, will enable the Federal Government to deal effectively with those who would replace the rule of reason with the tyranny of terror. The bill would make it a Federal crime to import, or transport in interstate commerce, any explosive with the knowledge that it is intended for illegal use. It would also make the possession of such explosives punishable by Federal law. In addition, the bill provides for Federal prosecution of persons who knowingly impart false information regarding attempts to commit acts that are prohibited by this legislation.

Enactment of this bill will take the dynamite out of the hands of the lunatic fringe; it will restore the exclusive rule of law and order; and it will prevent the catastrophes that are bound to occur if the school and church bombers go unchecked. The situation is critical. We cannot afford to let it simmer any longer. We must act rapidly and decisively. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we do so by enacting H.R. 465.

CUBA: PATIENCE?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the island of Cuba is an independent nation close to the United States in many ways. The Cuban people have the right to choose their own form of government, their governing officials, and to enact and enforce their own laws.

By revolution they sought a form of government free from oppression with guarantees of free speech, free press, free elections, and laws that would afford justice to all.

A year ago the world received word that the Castro revolution was successful, and Dr. Castro proclaimed "a new day for the people of Cuba." Everyone was hopeful, knowing, however, that there was obviously a tremendous task ahead. Constructing a free government from the rubble of civil war and the high-pitched emotions that ensue is no easy task; certainly not a part of the victory to be accomplished overnight. Such success would only emanate from justice, patience, and fortitude through the prudent leadership of responsible governing officials whose aims and actions were intelligently directed in consort with unexcelled moral conscience and acknowledged practices of good government.

Friends of Cuba and freedom-loving people the world over have watched and waited hopefully for evidences of freedom, stability, organization, and administration. Dr. Fidel Castro, the great revolutionary general, still maintains the primary responsibility for carrying out his promises. Although there have been many signs and words that have left encouragement in this regard, other actions and statements have created a state of consternation.

Recently there have been numerous cases of the questionable arrest and detention of Cubans, American citizens, and others. One such incident shocked the entire free world when Jim Buchanan, a staff writer for the Miami Herald, a Knight newspaper published at Miami, Fla., was detained, imprisoned, tried, and convicted while in Havana, Cuba, covering a news assignment. After being imprisoned for 12 days without charges in a freezing cold prison cell with light rations of horrible food, Mr. Buchanan, on the 13th day, was driven some 100 miles to Pinar del Rio. There he was tried an hour after arrival and by midnight found guilty of "concealing information." A military tribunal rendered a 14-year sentence. This was suspended on condition that Mr. Buchanan, a frequent visitor and longtime friend of Cuba, leave Cuba, never to return.

Maybe the Cubans have gained much through some of the Castro reforms. I certainly hope so. But continuation of "revolutionary methods" by an administration which is extremely popular at home hardly seems justified after a period of 1 year.

Certainly the doings of our closest neighbor are of concern to all of us. Cuban-American relations have always been of particular interest to me, more so since I serve on the Inter-American Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Miami is the gateway to Latin America. Our people have prided themselves in understanding the people of Cuba and Latin America. It is this bond which has kept me from speaking before and I speak now only with compassion and hope, for we are bound historically and on fundamental principles of government. But how patient can we be? For how long? Perhaps it is better to say, how patient can the Cuban people be?

Our relations may be strained, but we as a matter of policy did not make them that way. As John S. Knight, editor and publisher of the Knight newspapers says:

> We must never be tempted into believing that United States-Cuban relations have deteriorated to the point of no return. Historically, the two nations have long been friends. As so it must be again.

Top newspapers throughout the world have given page 1 prominence to a series of articles written by Jim Buchanan following his return to this country. The articles were available to the Associated Press clients over the world. The worldwide printed accounts attest to the interest in Cuba's struggle for freedom for her peoples, the freedom of the Cuban press, as well as the world's press.

Here is the story as told by Jim Buchanan in his day-by-day prison diary and articles:

DOES CASTRO KNOW THE FEAR HE IS CREATING?—INSIDE VIEW OF GROWING CUBAN STATE

(By James Buchanan)

If you're uncertain but concerned about the road the new Cuba is taking, come with me inside one of Fidel Castro's secret police jails.

Let me introduce you to some of the Cuban citizens who have lost their liberty, their property, and may lose their lives—because of a "crime" we in the United States wouldn't recognize.

Their crime?

Nothing more than being accused of anti-Castro-activity or displaying their anti-Castro sympathies.

Not all the stories I heard night after night lying in a secret police cell block are true, of course.

Some were deliberately planted by cell "stool pigeons" to gain my confidence and see if I'd confide my thoughts about Castro's new regime.

But the stories I'll relate of neighbor spying upon neighbor in a campaign of fear and suspicion are the ones I have been able to check and authenticate since leaving my Cuban jail.

Cuba isn't yet a police state, but the network of spies and jails is being organized in a pattern that threatens to smash the hopes and prayers of thousands of Cubans.

I first began to know and love Cuba and her people 2 years ago, when a tyrant named Fulgencia Batista held an iron grip on the island and the two Castro brothers were trying to rally support in the hills of Sierra Maestra.

Eighteen months ago I lived as a newsman in those hills with Raul Castro and his troops—heard them talk of their dreams and ideals.

I was on hand in happy Havana last New Year's Day when Batista at last had fled and the people prepared to welcome a new leader with hope in their hearts.

During the past 12 months I have visited Cuba often as a reporter and noted an increasing concern that she may have traded one dictator for another, though a much more popular one.

That concern was emphasized during those first few hours after my arrest on December 10, after I had found and interviewed Austin Frank Young, an escaped anti-Castro adventurer before Cuban authorities knew his whereabouts.

I sat and waited for what I expected to be my early release.

As I waited, I got the shock of tactics once used by German SS police under Adolf Hitler getting a replay in this Cuban secret police headquarters just 90 miles from Key West, United States.

I saw long lines of informers patiently waiting, as they did night after night, to tell stories about their neighbors to Castro agents.

I saw a 14-year-old boy thrown into my cell and confined for 4 days, because a woman had accused someone with a similar name of being a member of the hated "Tiger" army, the private strong arm of ex-dictator Batista.

I watched tears come to the eyes of once respected businessmen-prisoners, as they saw their property confiscated by the government because they had spoken out of turn about the Castro regime.

Let's look first at the case of 14-year-old Armando Cruz Gonzalez. His name was supplied by a woman informer and his address given as a certain block in downtown Havana.

Armando was picked up at home and tossed in our cell. His protesting parents simply were told Armando had been a longtime member of Batista's Tigers.

I looked at our cellmate Armando, and wondered. He was a scared, fuzzy-cheeked 14-year-old.

For 4 days he was in our cell. No charges. No attorney. No visitors. And no questioning by police.

Finally, on the fifth day, he was released.

"We have been unable to find your accuser," secret agents told him simply.

There are other, more frightening cases I'll discuss later.

But as I looked at Armando I wondered—does Fidel himself know how far his subordinates have gone in carrying out his every emotional whim?

It did not make me bitter, only disturbed that the men the world had hoped could lead Cuba from the tyranny of Batista are feeding their revolution with the old fires of hate and distrust.

They are fires that are starting to kill free speech, cripple the free press, and may set Cuba back where she was in 1958 under Batista—afraid to talk, afraid to listen, afraid to act, and almost afraid to live.

CUBAN JUSTICE BASED ON UNSUPPORTED ACCUSATIONS—INFORMERS GET IN LINE TO BETRAY NEIGHBORS

(By James Buchanan)

I can look back and see them even now in Cuba:

Men and women and children standing in line outside secret police headquarters in suburban Havana to tell officials of a neighbor's infidelity to Premier Fidel Castro.

They'll be there tonight just as they were every one of the 13 nights I watched them from the barred door of my cell.

You can roughly determine, just by looking at the length of the line, how many persons will be jailed the following day.

Jose Arago was one of these persons trapped by this frightening system of neighbor spying upon neighbor.

An intelligent, middle-aged man who owned a theater on La Rampa, Havana's fashionable shopping street, Arago made two mistakes one morning.

As he told me about it in our cellblock one night, here is how he got into trouble in less than 10 minutes:

Arago, a permanent guest of the Habana Hilton Hotel, walked into the dining room carrying a copy of the outspoken Cuban newspaper, Avance, whose Editor Jorge Zayas is one of the few newspapermen who doesn't hesitate to criticize Castro.

That was mistake No. 1, for a hotel waiter told Arago he was reading the wrong newspaper.

Mistake No. 2 came when Arago, a Columbia University student for 3 years, declared he was entitled to his own opinion.

The same afternoon he was arrested by DIER (Cuban secret police) as a counter-revolutionary.

The next morning in our cell he read in the newspaper Revolucion, Castro's official mouthpiece, that his theater had been confiscated by the government. The action came under a new law announced by Castro permitting his regime to take over the property of anyone arrested for counter-revolutionary activities.

At that, my cellmate proved to be more fortunate than some. A few days later Arago was permitted to walk out of jail, following his "lesson" on the new Cuban Government's justice.

He never was officially charged, never tried. Yet he lost his property for daring to speak critically of the Government to a hotel waiter.

Incredible?

Perhaps it is. But cases like these are happening hourly. The list of confiscated Cuban property is growing.

Who are these secret police with such terrible power?

They are known officially as members of the Departmento Investigacion Ejercito Revolucionaro, and more informally as DIER, the revolutionary army's investigative department.

These men have the power to arrest at will, the authority to search without warrants, and the Government-given right to hold a prisoner incommunicado without charges for months without end.

Eberdo Calderon was another of my cellmates. He looked 65 but would admit to only 58 years. For 22 of them he had been a guard in the Presidential Palace, through many of Cuba's quick changing governments.

He was the type who usually runs the elevator or checks passes, the type the girls call "Pop," and the men call "Dad."

Calderon was under arrest by secret police for the fourth time since Fidel Castro moved in behind the January 1959 revolution. Calderon has yet to be charged with any crime, has yet to be told specifically why he has spent more than 6 months in jail.

His only apparent crime is that he was a palace guard under Batista, as he had been during previous regimes for 22 years.

"When I get out this time I won't try to get a boat for the United States—I'll swim," Calderon told me.

The stories of Arago and Calderon are typical, not unusual, among the thousands of similar cases which keep Cuba's jails full to overflowing.

Those chivatas who appear nightly at the jail where I was imprisoned are asked only four questions as they line up before secret police interrogators to inform on their neighbors:

"What is the name of the person you are accusing?"

"What is his address?"

"What did he do?"

"What is your name?"

Arrest follows for the accused, without any investigation of the accusations. With the arrest comes loss of liberty and property.

Caught up in such a carefully organized campaign of suspicion and hatred, freedom-loving Cubans find that a revengeful neighbor can hold their fate in his hands.

TEENAGERS KEY TO WEIRD SYSTEM OF FAST JUSTICE

(By James Buchanan)

Those teenage kids strolling down Havana's Prado today in their baggy-kneed jeans, scuffed shoes and dirty shirts, aren't Cuban beatniks.

They're DIER agents, the gumshoes for Fidel Castro's new secret police.

While they look and act like juvenile delinquents, they are the ground roots of a new espionage system designed to pit Cuban neighbor against neighbor in a campaign of suspicion and hatred.

And while these ex-high school youngsters play detective in Havana, their much more suave counterparts represent Castro's growing police state in key cities in the United States.

They belong to a new and vindictive breed of secret police under the banner of Departmento Investigacion Ejercito Revolutionaire, Castro's investigative department, the dreaded DIER.

These DIER agents are part of a unique network which passes for a judicial system in Cuba today.

It's a system in which accuser, arresting agent, jury and judge make up a closely knit team, all coached by the same man—Fidel Castro himself.

Castro's secret police—DIER—makes the arrests. Castro's military tribunals—often made up of bearded revolutionaries with no legal training—conduct the trials, render verdicts and pass sentence.

It's a judicial system in which the fix can be put in simply on signal from the boss or one of his associates—as we'll see later.

As those who take the first step in Cuba's new system of justice, making the arrests, DIER agents are the key to Castro's growing police state.

And they are impressionistic youngsters being trained in service for their master—much as Adolf Hitler organized the youth of Nazi Germany two generations ago.

It was agents of DIER who arrested me December 10 after I had located and interviewed Austin Frank Young, an anti-Castro adventurer who had escaped from Cuban jail.

In Cuba, DIER agents number in the hundreds. They bragged to me during my forced confinement that they have 100 agents working in Miami and another 50 in New York.

Those appear to be exaggerations. But DIER is extremely active in the United States. Sources in Miami say there are 35 to 50 DIER agents working here. They prowl Flagler St. and the scattered Cuban colonies near the downtown area.

In New York, an estimated 20 to 30 well-trained agents gumshoe along Amsterdam and Broadway in the 103d St. area. Similar agents are on the job in other U.S. cities with large Latin or Cuban populations.

Their assignment: to make sure the same thing doesn't happen to Castro that happened to his predecessor, Dictator Fulgencio Batista.

ADVANCE VERDICTS GIVEN

During Batista's regime, Castro and other anti-Batista elements in Cuba obtained nearly all their weapons and supplies illegally through New York and Miami. Fidel remembers that well, and doesn't intend to trust U.S. customs alone with stopping movement of anti-Castro weapons.

In Cuba itself, the most disturbing thing about the operation of the new system of justice is that little or no investigation follows arrests by DIER agents.

DIER's big brother, the military tribunals, sits in trial on the accused, often after they already have the signal for a preconceived verdict.

Take my arrest and my "trial" as an example.

Folllowing my arrest by DIER, I sat in a secret police cell for 12 days, with no formal charges filed.

The Cuban Supreme Court had been asked to decide whether a civilian or military court had jurisdiction in my case.

On the seventh day of my imprisonment, while the Supreme Court was studying my case, Castro attacked me in a television appearance and announced that a military tribunal would try me.

"If the courts condemn Buchanan, he will be detained here. Or perhaps, what is better, the courts will order him deported, never to return to Cuba to molest us any more," Castro said.

ONLY TIMING REMAINS

The military tribunal had the signal for my case. The only question remaining was the timing.

On the 13th day of my imprisonment in Havana, I was hustled out of my cell at 4:30 p.m. and escorted to Pinar Del Rio military prison, 100 miles away.

Only after I arrived at Pinar Del Rio was I told my trial would start at 8 p.m.

I met the attorney who was to defend me just 50 minutes before my trial began.

Five military "judges" heard my case. Only one of them had any legal training. All were below 30 in age.

For 4 hours they staged a "show" for public and press to witness. At the trial's conclusion, the five judges deliberated less than 20 minutes, including the time it took to type up a lengthy explanation of their verdict.

That verdict: exactly what Castro had suggested 6 days earlier—expulsion from Cuba.

WEIRD CUBAN JUSTICE

Prosecutor Oscar Fernandez Jordain, in asking the tribunal to give me a suspended sentence on condition I leave Cuba said:

"In the interest of humanity, I ask the court to suspend sentence on this newspaperman so that he can report how honest and fair our trials are over here during the revolution."

My case was a testimonial that when the boss speaks in Cuba these days, even the judges listen.

This is the weird sort of Cuban justice that is gradually putting an umbrella of fear over Cuba's citizens today.

The disturbing thing for the Cuban people—the same sort of coached military tribunals that handled my case have this year ordered more than 500 Cubans executed in the bloodiest purge in their country's history.

WORLD FREE PRESS ON TRIAL IN CUBA

(By James Buchanan)

When the Cuban guards searched me that first night in their secret police jail, they overlooked one thing—a small fountain pen filled with red ink.

Somehow this oversight became one of the most important things in my 14 days of imprisonment.

With that pen, I scratched out notes as each day ended, and even wrote a letter to my wife that I managed to smuggle out of jail.

But in the long hours I had to think about Fidel Castro's new Cuba, that pen took on a symbolic significance, too.

It helped remind me that I was the eighth newsman arrested during the past 6 months of Castro's regime—yet Fidel had been unable to lift himself above the freedom of expression.

Since my expulsion from Cuba, two other newsmen have been arrested, bringing the 6-month total to 10.

In each case, the motive for the arrests apparently was the same—to harass the newsmen in the hope it would suppress their writing about the unpleasantries of the Castro regime.

Any doubt that I was to be another guinea pig in Castro's intense campaign against the press was erased shortly after my arrest on December 10 following an interview with anti-Castro fugitive Austin Frank Young.

While I was seated in the headquarters of DIER, Castro's secret police agency, I spotted an old friend entering the building.

He was Maj. Manuel Pineiro, one of Raul Castro's close associates with whom I had spent time in the hills of Sierra Maestra as a reporter covering the Castro buildup in mid-1958.

I tried to throw my arms around Manuel in a typical Latin greeting, feeling certain he would obtain my quick release from jail.

But this man who had welcomed me as a newsman at the Castro hideaway 18 months ago, and confided in me about his dreams and ideals for the new Cuba, now turned his back on me.

In my same broken Spanish that Manuel and his friends had understood so well before, I explained to him about my unwarranted arrest for going after a touchy news story.

"Is not the same now," Manuel told me. "Is now we are in times of stress."

He walked away and in my 14 days of imprisonment, I never saw Manuel again. It was obvious he understood that the Castro regime intended to make an example out of me to teach newsmen a lesson.

Days later I heard Castro-coached Prosecutor Oscar Fernandez Jordain orate in his summation at my military trial:

"The foreign press must be taught that it cannot come to Cuba and undermine our revolution."

It was not just a scared Jim Buchanan, but the entire foreign press on trial and being warned.

Then, a few minutes later, my own attorney, Orlando de la Bordilla, showed that the courage of freedom still exists in Cuba.

A Pinar del Rio associate of the nonpolitical Havana law firm of Mario Lazo, the attorney told the tribunal:

"Cuba should be thankful for the foreign press and stop being so hypersensitive. Newspapermen must be permitted to write about what they think is bad as well as about what is good."

The military judges disagreed, of course, and found me guilty of "concealing information." My sentence, on an obvious advance signal from the boss, was expulsion from Cuba.

Commenting on that sentence the next day, Jorge Zayas, editor of Avance in Havana, and one of the few Cuban editors with the courage to criticize Castro, wrote:

"American news agencies and newspapers may soon find themselves without experienced personnel to send to this country if the Cuban Government continues to arrest foreign correspondents and prohibit their return home."

In my case, Castro made sure I would not return by holding a 14-year suspended prison term over my head.

In other cases, involving foreign newsmen, he has been less forceful but nearly as effective in trying to stifle a critical press.

Ian Aitken, London Express reporter, was arrested and held overnight at the same time I was in prison.

When he was released the next day, the Express asked him to leave Cuba for his own safety.

Earlier, Jules DuBois of the Chicago Tribune, an outspoken Castro critic, had been declared persona non grata in Cuba, although not officially expelled.

The threat of physical danger to DuBois became so great his newspaper withdrew him from the country.

But while the growing Cuban police state concentrates on intimidating the foreign press, a handful of courageous editors at home are becoming more outspoken.

"Buchanan is totally innocent" of the charges, the newspaper Avance wrote during my imprisonment. And Editor Zayas chided Castro for thinking he could afford to hold me to teach a lesson to the press.

Also, in the highly respected Diario de la Marina and the hard-hitting English-language daily, Havana Times, the Cuban people got the truth about my case.

Such support, from a small but stanch segment of the Cuban press which does not have the safety of distance between it and Fidel Castro, can make an American newsman very humble.

And it makes 14 days in jail a small price to pay to alert the world that once again Cuba is in danger of having force replace free discussion.

MY LAST LOOK: HOPE—OR FEAR, IT'S UP TO FIDEL

(By James Buchanan)

The last time I saw Cuba I was escorted to a waiting plane by an armed military guard, just 7 days ago.

A youngster who serves as a DIER (secret police) guard asked me before I boarded the plane: "Are you angry with the Cuban people now?"

"No," I told him, thinking of the Cuban people as a whole, "I'm just sorry for you."

I remember now my first look at the new Cuba last January just after Dictator Fulgencio Batista fled and Fidel Castro took over.

What a change has crept over the lovely Caribbean island in these 12 months. My thoughts take the form of a letter.

I HAD HOPED TO BE WITH YOU

To the Cuban people:

This is New Year's Eve of 1959, and I am in Miami.

Weeks ago I had intended to be back in Havana tonight to celebrate the coming of the new year and the anniversary of your revolution.

But, instead, I have been banned from your country and told that I can never come back.

A year ago I reported your hopes and ambitions for the new Cuba. On January 21 I wrote in the Herald:

"Cuba's face has been lifted.

"She looks and acts like a young girl today, and not the haggard, fearful thing of less than a month ago.

"Change is apparent everywhere in the island and in every walk of life. There's happiness, and gaiety, and most of all—hope."

Those were the days when foreign newsmen were welcome in Cuba.

You were free to talk, the press was free to report. It was a calm, friendly time, and a government secure in the good wishes of its people found no reason to limit freedom of expression.

CRITICS TREATED LIKE TRAITORS

What has happened to your country since then?

In the spring, the cooling-off period began.

On June 30, Maj. Pedro Luis Diaz Lanz resigned as the chief of the air force, charging Communist activity in the Government. He fled the country.

On July 17, President Manuel Urrutia was forced to resign after Fidel charged him with being a traitor to the revolution.

On October 21, Maj. Hubert Matos, a longtime Castro buddy and one of the revolutionary favorites, resigned his army post, charging Communist influence in the Government. He later was tried as a traitor and sentenced to 20 years.

On October 27 Maj. Camilio Cienfuegos, army chief of staff and second only to Fidel in popularity with you Cuban people, vanished under mysterious circumstances. The antigovernment whispers grew louder.

As the tide swung away from the regime, new laws made it possible to confiscate your property merely if you were arrested, not convicted, of counterrevolutionary activity.

Your newspapers were told they must print a statement denouncing all foreign news which is critical of the revolution.

I could go on, but the pattern is clear.

No longer secure as the crises mounted, your Government resorted to more forceful attempts to stifle all criticism.

You have virtually lost your freedom to talk, except when you agree with your Government. I have lost my freedom to report because I did in your country what newspapermen have done traditionally all over the world—gone after a good news story, even when it involved someone unfriendly to the political leaders.

My editors intend to appeal my verdict and ask for exoneration by the Cuban courts. We all know, of course, that this could be granted only on signal from Fidel.

Newspaper clippings take me back on this New Year's Eve to last February, when I wrote:

"Right now Cuba is vibrant and excited, and, most important, it is speaking. * * *

"No man fears he will be pointed out as an informer merely through the spite of a neighbor. The new Government and new army are demanding proof to go with the accusations."

But in these past months your speech has become guarded and neighbor is spying on neighbor. Your year of liberation threatens to become a year of destruction.

Few men have had the opportunity to make a nation great as has Fidel Castro.

The opportunity is still there.

A few months from now the end of this chapter in the hopeful new Cuba may well be written.

Fidel himself must decide what the outcome will be—

The hope that the revolution promised all of you in January, or

The fear and hostility that many of you and I found in December.

My New Year's wish to you, my friends, is that, in spite of the disturbing trends of the last few months, Fidel may yet make the right choice for the future.

MY JAIL DIARY—JAMES BUCHANAN KEPT A HIDDEN DIARY DURING HIS 14 DAYS IN A CUBAN JAIL—HIS NOTES PROVIDE A GRAPHIC ACCOUNT OF CUBAN CELL LIFE

(By James Buchanan)

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, FIRST DAY

I'm in jail. Tossed in at 10:30 p.m. after hours of sitting in half a dozen DIER (military police) offices. They say I helped (Austin) Young escape and was trying to get him out of the country. They're nuts.

U.S. consul says it looks like deep trouble. I'm freezing in this 9- by 20-foot cell with six other guys. No blanket, no lights, sandwich for dinner. Other prisoners must have been here a long time—they look like hell. Where did I get the idea I'd be out in 5 hours?

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, SECOND DAY

Hauled me out at 8:30 a.m. to see newspaper people. Sleepless night—put me in a cellblock, this time with Young. Spent an hour looking for a hidden microphone and sizing up the six other prisoners. At least one's a DIER man hoping Young and I will talk. We aren't. Nothing to hide, anyway, but just try to tell them that. Guards like to stare at me. First prison food: black beans and rice, roots or vegetables. No appetite. Hugh Kessler, of Embassy, told me I'm to go to Pinar del Rio and be jailed there; DIER agent says it'll be La Cabana fortress. I don't go anywhere, just sit on cot and stare back at the people.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, THIRD DAY

Beard's beginning to itch and no talk of letting me out. Got a blanket now so last night wasn't so cold—but my clothes are getting crusty.

Made my own coffee this morning when stuff they gave us was sour and couldn't drink it. Built newspaper fire on cell floor, heated water in tin can and poured it over coffee grounds held in a handkerchief. Not bad. Awfully thirsty. Only water comes from tap alongside toilet in corner of cell. Fellow newsman visiting from the Herald brought oranges and they help.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 13, FOURTH DAY

Some prisoners angry today because not permitted to attend mass. Guards are bringing their girl friends and relatives to stare and giggle at us through the bars. Wonder what would happen if I threw a shoe in their faces?

Other prisoners shaving but they've refused razor to Young (the man interviewed by Buchanan) and me. Wasn't there supposed to be an office party in Maimi tonight?

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, FIFTH DAY

Friend from Herald brought me peanut butter and jelly sandwiches * * * tasted better than filet mignon.

Guards are feeding my visitors rumors about where I'll go, knowing it will get back to me, thinking it will worry me. It does. These never-washed blankets give us something to do each morning. Takes 30 minutes to pick the fuzz off my trousers.

Tonight when guards shook down our cell they slipped something under my mattress. When they'd left I found an empty matchbox. What's their idea? Anyway, I burned it immediately.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 15, SIXTH DAY

How many more? Feel filthy. Guards claim a radio broadcast this morning said Young's conviction had been set aside. Just propaganda to keep you on the mental rollercoaster.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, SEVENTH DAY

Young has guards crazy. Just showed them how to make a bomb from matches, mattress wadding, and a tin cup. Claims he's going to blow door off the cell next.

Dorticos' (President of Cuba) answer to the IAPA plea for my release doesn't sound too good. But is there any other profession in the world that backs up its members like the newspapermen fighting for me?

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 17, EIGHTH DAY

One Cuban newspaper says I'll be tried in civil court, another says it will be a military tribunal. Whichever it is, I wish they'd get moving. Wonder if people still eats eggs and bacon for breakfast?

A political prisoner is known by the sacks he keeps by his bunkside. I have five. That makes me a big wheel.

More questioning by the DIER. At least this time it was by an adult, not the punk kids who make up most of this secret police.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 18, NINTH DAY

Had my first shave—ouch!

Found out how you file fingernails in jail. Rub them against metal side of your bed. Do only one or two a day, that way you have something to do tomorrow.

Four of new arrivals were arrested in a church. Waiting for owner of a boat to pick them up—DIER came instead. Somebody's wife talked too much.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 10TH DAY

Austin Young's birthday; he's 39. He says "Friends are requested to send saws."

Tough to sleep at night. DIER seldom makes arrests before midnight, and racket goes on until 4 in the morning.

Funny how quick you can get accustomed to Cuban cigarettes. I'd give $10 for a big hamburger with onions and a bottle of beer.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 20, 11TH DAY

Is this the 10th day or the 11th? I'm losing count. How long will it be before I do like the others and start figuring a break?

Something new on menu today—fried chicken. Looked like it had been cooked by a flame thrower as it ran across the farmyard.

They're giving me, the "up" treatment today. Lieutenant Alvarez told Kessler (of U.S. Embassy) my case would be resolved with 2 to 3 days. Tomorrow they'll tell me my file has been lost. That's the "down" treatment.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 12TH DAY

More prisoners, more monotony. Even the worst pocketbook makes good reading now.

One prisoner lost his theater, another expects to lose his alcohol plant. Fidel's confiscation scheme.

More questioning by DIER, this time by lieutenant who was jailed in Miami. He loves me. Really got mad when I wouldn't sign a statement written in Spanish.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 13TH DAY

Well, no Christmas at home for sure now. They've closed the courts until January 2 or 7. Some of these guys are talking about going over the wall Christmas Eve.

I've saved a can of peanuts for a Christmas treat * * *.

(Buchanan's diary ends here. Moments later he and Young, the man he interviewed, were sped 100 miles to Pinar del Rio, where he was tried an hour after arrival, found guilty by midnight of concealing information, and ordered to leave the country. He was deported the next day, and returned to his wife in Miami 2 days before Christmas.)

The following editorials by John S. Knight and one by the Miami Herald editorial staff are objective and I think very well reflect the American attitude:

NEWSMEN MIGHT SUCCEED WHERE DIPLOMATS FAILED

(By John S. Knight)

Miami Herald Reporter Jim Buchanan came home for Christmas, and a good one it was.

Only a few days ago, Jim was sure he would be spending the holidays in a Cuban jail. For despite widespread protests against Buchanan's arrest and detention on a trumped-up charge of "concealing facts" about the escape of anti-Castro fugitive Frank Austin Young, the wheels of justice were turning slowly.

Then suddenly and without warning, Jim was rushed before a military court in Pinar del Rio and given a 14-year suspended sentence. In the same pronouncement, a five-man military court told him to get out of Cuba within 24 hours.

Reporter Buchanan's immediate reaction was a sigh of relief. "Thank goodness," he said, "I didn't understand enough Spanish to know I had first been sentenced to 14 years at hard labor on the Isle of Pines."

Previously Buchanan had told the military tribunal: "I was never guilty of anything but being a newspaper reporter."

But in Fidel Castro's regime, all newspapermen who report the truth are suspect.

SPEAKING OUT IN CUBA TAKES MAN OF COURAGE

Our gratitude goes to William H. Cowles, president of the Inter-American Press Association and Russell Wiggins, president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, for their prompt intervention in behalf of Jim Buchanan.

We are grateful to Jorge Zayas, courageous publisher of Avance, for his attempts to gain Buchanan's release. And to Diario de la Marina for speaking so forthrightly of the Buchanan affair.

These two newspapers, together with Prensa Libre, are fighting bravely to preserve press freedom in Cuba.

Editors in the United States who are free to criticize anyone from the mayor to the President without fear of physical retaliation. should know that it takes real guts for a Cuban editor to oppose the policies of Fidel Castro.

Publishers such as Jorge Zayas have endured violent attacks over Cuban television networks by the Government. Vicious smear campaigns to frighten away advertisers are constantly in motion.

A new law, not yet invoked, makes newspaper editors liable to imprisonment for 6 to 18 years for publishing anything that "tends to limit the independence of the nation or provoke violation of existing laws."

But Herald Reporter E. V. W. Jones says that Revolucion, the Government's official organ, is "free to deify Castro, propagandize the revolution, shape Cuban public opinion—and pour hell's fire and brimstone on the United States."

Fortunately, Publisher Zayas has not lost his sense of humor. He told Eddie Jones of a Cuban saying to the effect that if you are afraid, you buy a dog.

"I have bought a dog," he added with a wry smile and pointed to a puppy playing on his office floor.

MODERATE APPROACH SEEMED RIGHT COURSE

We appreciate the many offers of assistance that have come through various sources.

Some of them contained very useful suggestions which now need not be employed. Others were critical of my letter to Dr. Fidel Castro on the ground that it was too moderate.

A few thought the United States should bring Castro to his knees by reducing the quota of sugar we buy from Cuba.

But at no time did it seem wise to involve the U.S. Government, other than requesting our Embassy personnel to keep in touch with Buchanan and give him such assistance as was feasible and possible.

WE MUST BE FRIENDS WITH PEOPLE OF CUBA

We must never be tempted into believing that United States-Cuban relations have deteriorated to the point of no return. Historically, the two nations have long been friends.

And so it must be again, Castro or no Castro.

The point at issue in the Buchanan case is the right of a newspaperman to seek information and report it objectively. This convention is generally recognized in all free nations although periodic censorship is still employed in many.

The Castro government was hell bent upon teaching foreign correspondents a lesson, and Jim Buchanan's "indiscretion" in buying a bandage for a fugitive's injured leg provided the needed excuse to clap Jim in jail.

Jose A. Maestri, of the Havana Press Association, said as much when he declared: "Some Americans seem to feel they possess a freebooter's license authorizing them to commit any offense. The Buchanan case is one more instance of this."

PERHAPS DR. CASTRO CAN SEE THE LIGHT

We hold no bitterness toward Premier Castro and the members of his government for their incredible treatment of Buchanan.

Jim is home, and for the moment, nothing else seems important.

But a longer view suggests that the Inter-American Press Association and the American Society of Newspaper Editors should move constructively to bring about a better understanding between the government of Fidel Castro and the press which reports the facts of Cuban life.

I offered to discuss the problems of journalism, as they relate to Cuban press coverage, with Premier Castro but to my regret he has not seen fit to reply.

Possibly the ASNE, which entertained Dr. Castro in Washington last April, could arrange a meeting with the Premier in Havana for the purpose of clarifying in Castro's mind the traditional role of a reporter in a foreign land.

If we are to seek better understanding and promote the cause of press freedom in this hemisphere, such discussions with national leaders are at times imperative.

We shall gain nothing by denouncing Dr. Castro in bitter editorials as the enemy of freedom until such time as our press has made a constructive effort to have him see the light.

THEN WE WILL KNOW WHERE FIDEL STANDS

Perhaps a joint request by leaders of the ASNE and the IAPA to confer with Premier Castro would be productive.

It is far more important for a responsible press to seek such an understanding than to sit at a safe distance and berate Dr. Castro for the indignities heaped upon a reporter who was merely doing his job.

Should Castro grant such an audience, perhaps some barriers to understanding could be removed.

If the suggestion is spurned, we will know that Castro's words in Washington about press freedom were hollow and meaningless.

But let the effort be made.

Perhaps newspapermen can succeed where the diplomats have failed.

[From the Miami Herald, Dec. 30, 1959]

THE YEAR OF CASTRO—AN ANNIVERSARY IN CUBA

The revolution of the barbudos has a birthday Friday.

Just 1 year ago the henchmen of the defeated and discredited Batista were running for their lives while Castro's young men streamed down from the hills to take over Cuba.

Hope flamed in the breast of the campesinos, and the Habaneros lined the ancient streets to shout hosannas to their savior. Never had any victorious general entered so happily into his kingdom.

"I bring you freedom, and justice for all," said Dr. Castro. "This is the dawn of a new day for the people of Cuba."

The people of the United States applauded. The old bonds of friendship were strong. There was a general feeling among North Americans that the little man of Cuba would get a better deal, at last. They waited for the bright dawn.

It has been slow in coming.

First were the drumhead trials of the Batista followers. Many were convicted under the eyes of the mob and hurried to death by bullet beside the open graves. More than 500 perished before the blood bath was over.

Dr. Castro answered worldwide shock with the argument that it was necessary to stamp out the seeds of cruelty and death left by Batista to sprout again.

The program of agrarian reform had what seemed a laudable purpose. Castro planners wanted to root out the sugar plantation economy which benefited a few landowners. They moved to break up the estates and give land to the peasants.

U.S. interests, which had large holdings in sugar and cattle, complained that payment was inadequate, and was in 20-year bonds redeemable in pesos at that.

The new government reduced rents and utility rates, raised salaries and froze jobs. It moved vigorously into a program of social welfare, education, and medical care. Cuba's schools had been notoriously poor, but now there was improvement at all levels.

Talk grew of Communist influence. Schoolbooks were rewritten to advocate new beliefs. Leaders known to have Red leanings appeared in high places.

Castro repeatedly denied that he was a Communist or that Communists had undue influence. On at least one occasion, in a spectacular showdown fight for control of the labor unions, the Communists were defeated.

Castro moved steadily toward one-man rule, changing presidents, ministers, and Army leaders at will. Those who opposed him were traitors. He whipped up mob sentiment by marathon television speeches. Once he resigned, to resume office by mob acclaim.

The first year of Castro rule ends with United States-Cuban relations at an alltime low. Cuban economy is on the floor. Its tourist trade is almost destroyed, and unemployment spreads. Cuba's interference in the affairs of neighboring countries has cost it friendship in the Latin American community.

But the common man of Cuba has gained much. He has more money to spend, a better standard of living, and better prospects for his children.

Whether Castro can build a strong economy as a base for these social gains remains to be seen. Whether the people of Cuba can regain their liberties and free institutions, elect their own leaders and decide their own destiny are things for the sixties to reveal.

These are the questions as Cuba moves into the second year of the Castro era.

Whatever the answers the people of the United States have only good wishes for the people of Cuba. The hope for the new year is that the Cubans survive their trial by fire and emerge a prouder, stronger, and happier nation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not oppose the aspirations of a friendly people. Perhaps the second year in Cuba will be a better one. We Americans want for the Cubans the free government and the better way of life promised them. We hope these are achieved with dignity and responsible action.

BOTH MAJOR POLITICAL PARTIES SHOULD BE KEPT APPRISED OF NEGOTIATIONS AND DELIBERATIONS NOW BEING CARRIED ON BY THE PRESIDENT AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MONAGAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to give notice of a recent recommendation that I have made to the President.

The year of 1960 will be a presidential year and it is entirely possible that 1961 will see a Democratic administration, including a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of State.

Unfortunately, however, the international problems of the United States are not bounded by the calendar or by the limitations of our political party organizations and these problems will be just as complicated and difficult of solution in 1961 as they have been in the past. In fact, in delicacy and complexity in many ways they will exceed those of the past.

For this reason, it is more important than ever that both major political parties be kept apprised in detail of the negotiations and deliberations which are presently being carried on by the President and the Secretary of State. If there should be a shift of administration in 1961, the times are too fraught with peril to permit a period of inaction while a new administration is learning the details of the negotiations which are now being carried on. And, the inability to make a prompt, well-informed decision at this time might well have disastrous results for the United States.

The President is now involved in negotiations on a summit meeting and discussions relating to future talks with Premier Khrushchev in Russia. The effects of these talks will last far beyond the end of this year, and I have stated to President Eisenhower my opinion that the welfare of the country would be served by the Presidential appointment of a member of the Democratic Party as a participant in these discussions. By such an appointment, the Democratic Party could be kept informed of the details of negotiations and would be much better able to act in the event that Democratic candidates are successful at the polls in November.

I realize that Senator DODD recently made a somewhat similar suggestion when he recommended that President Eisenhower take a prominent Democrat on his recent trip to Europe and Asia. In that connection, however, I could also see certain practical objections to the proposal. In this instance, however, there would be no possible partisan objection and only benefit could result.

As James Reston so well indicated in the New York Times of January 3, 1960, the President has already on other occasions taken Democrats into his confidence in various foreign policy matters and in this way has set a precedent.

I would make no particular recommendation as to a person who might be appointed but I will content myself with saying that the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee would be the type of key person who might well be considered in this connection. There are, of course, numerous other prominent Democrats who have had widespread experience in international affairs who could serve with distinction.

This suggestion is not made with the intent to embarrass, nor is it submitted with the idea of gaining political advantage. It is a proposal for a practical solution to a substantial problem which is inevitably presented by the periodic termination of the term of our national administrations.

I sincerely hope that the President will give every possible consideration to this proposal because I believe that he will be acting in the best interests of the country if he takes such a step.

ANTI-SEMITISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, after most careful and lengthy consideration on the merits and demerits of having additional attention focused on the matter, I have decided to take the floor to comment on the subject of the desecrations of places of worship which have been taking place in several nations. I am chiefly concerned with the recent anti-Semitic incidents in Germany. The possible implications in this area are, of course, horrendous. There have been incidents also, I am sad to note, in many nations including England, France, Norway, the United States, and, most recently, distant Australia.

There have been incidents recently in my congressional district in New York City, and in several other cities in this country.

Leaders of the various religious faiths have been quick to state their firm conviction that in the United States these incidents do not represent organized and growing anti-Semitism or other intolerance, but rather malicious mischief and hoodlumism. In Germany, however, as was stated by Benjamin R. Epstein, national director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, these incidents "cannot be looked upon as isolated acts, but must be viewed against a nation's history."

The German Government under the leadership of Chancellor Adenauer, has acted responsibly and promptly. The German Government has made anti-Semitic activities a punishable crime and we have every reason to expect that the matter will be dealt with adequately on a legal level. From all reports it was hardly necessary for our Government to express its grave shock and concern, as German leaders themselves were quick to express shock and concern. The Adenauer government has given every assurance that it recognizes that such incidents are not consistent with a society that is democratic in concept and practice, and it is fully aware of the damage that these incidents have done to its world image. It is obvious that Chancellor Adenauer has an abiding respect and affection for the United States and depends upon the United States. I can only imagine the anguish that this matter is causing him, knowing the concern that it raises in the hearts of many of our countrymen. Immediately following the desecration of the Cologne Synagogue on Christmas Eve, Dr. Adenauer said: "I heard with revulsion of this atrocious deed which all decent Germans join me in condemning." The German people are united in their condemnation of this kind of thing. Witness the parade of 40,000 youths in Berlin last Friday, in protest of such acts.

The most frightening consequence of this matter is that it serves to divide the NATO countries. Obviously, if tensions can be re-created between France and the lowland countries and Germany it serves the purposes of the Communists. This is not to say that these incidents have been inspired by the Communists, because as yet there is no proof, but it does serve, wittingly or unwittingly, the Communist purpose in that it creates a break in the solidarity of the free world against Communist purposes.

I have heard it said on several occasions that the less said about this subject the better, as publicity serves only to incite sick minds who see it in the press or on TV to commit similar heinous acts. Perhaps so. But this is not a problem that can be ignored or swept under the rug, nor will it disappear by itself. It seems to me that its needed correction requires the close attention of all governmental bodies. We expect the free German Government to take action in Germany and our religious leaders have so stated, quite properly. Can we expect less of our own Government here in the United States? Free people everywhere, and all people who cherish and pray for liberty, will look to our example.

In New York City, I am pleased to note that Police Commissioner Kennedy has increased his vigilance.

In Washington, I would hope that the Department of Justice would undertake an immediate examination of acts of desecration that have occurred in several cities, and of course the FBI may do so without attendant publicity in order to determine whether or not the matter is of an organized nature and interstate, and if so whether Federal crimes are involved.

Simultaneously, it seems to me entirely appropriate for the Civil Rights Commission to make its own inquiry into the matter. The reasons are as follows:

The Civil Rights Act of 1957 established the Commission as a factfinding and investigatory body with a primary purpose to collect and accumulate information on matters of race, color, religion, or national origin so that a more comprehensive approach can be made by the Congress in protecting the rights of all citizens. In this context the Commission's authority should be invoked so that we in the Congress may have ample opportunity to gain insight into this problem. These deplorable incidents should be carefully scrutinized with a view toward swift and stringent remedies. We need facts immediately so that we can understand and approach this vital problem now.

These instances of vandalism in all probability will prove to be malicious mischief perpetrated by a few malcontents; but on the other hand such activities have been known to trigger hatred and violence on a grandiose scale.

I do not wish to be an alarmist in these matters but I am convinced that the harbingers of racial and religious hatred should be checked here in the United States and abroad before they can gain any foothold.

RED TIDE IN LATIN AMERICA AND THE REMEDY

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. Speaker, during the last 3 years I have devoted much time and study to the threats now rapidly mounting in the South: the rising Red tide in Latin America, the turmoil in the Caribbean, and the crucial question of sovereignty over the Canal Zone and Panama Canal.

These developments cannot be viewed as isolated incidents but together constitute the gravest threat to the Western Hemisphere since 1823, when President Monroe, in his famous message to the Congress, announced what has become known as the Monroe Doctrine.

Though some publicists have presented accurate pictures of individual incidents and their significance, none have approached the problem from the perspective afforded by a lifetime study of history with a view to supplying the remedy. Thus, I read with fullest gratification an illuminating article in the December 28, 1959, issue of U.S. News & World Report by Dr. Samuel Flagg Bemis, distinguished American historian.

Accompanying his article, Dr. Bemis outlined the draft of a proposed resolution which he urges the Congress to adopt. Using this as a base on which to start, I have prepared and introduced today House Concurrent Resolution 450. This measure, together with House Concurrent Resolution 33, introduced in the last session, would clarify the present situation and provide a historically based policy for putting an end to the current piecemeal conquest of the Americas.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to echo the extremely pertinent question of Dr. Bemis: "Why Wait for the Blows to Fall?" We should lead now before it is too late, for the ultimate fate of the United States and constitutional liberty are at stake.

In order that the notable thesis of Dr. Bemis may be recorded in the permanent annals of the Congress, the indicated article, the editor's biographical sketch of its author, and a copy of my House concurrent resolution are included as parts of these remarks and commended for perusal by all concerned with the question of hemispheric security, especially Members of the Congress.

The article, biographical sketch, and resolution follow:

A WAY TO STOP THE REDS IN LATIN AMERICA—A NOTED HISTORIAN SETS A COURSE FOR QUICK ACTION BY THE UNITED STATES

(By Samuel Flagg Bemis, professor, diplomatic history and inter-American relations, Yale University)

Prof. Arnold Toynbee—in a recent, 1958, brilliant study of "The Eve of War, 1939"—has called attention to the fact that in 1940 no power was threatened on more than two fronts, east and west, whilst now, 1959, each of the two surviving power groups—U.S.A. and U.S.S.R.—is threatened on three fronts, east, west, and north, "a first-class revolution in international affairs * * * that is not easily grasped or taken into account."

Now suppose the United States should be threatened on all four fronts, including south as well as north, from the Caribbean, as well as the Arctic? Instead of an expansive and friendly ally like Canada stretching for thousands of miles between us and Soviet jet, submarine, and missile bases, with a double line of distant early warning trips, we suddenly become exposed to such bases almost within sight of our southern coastal cities, and right athwart our naval communications from Atlantic to Pacific by the Panama Canal? Would this not tip the balance of power fatally against the United States in the present deadly crisis of power and politics which we call the cold war?

Since 1934, the first line of our defense has shifted from Panama to Europe and Asia. In this geopolitical framework, the strategical paths over the Arctic regions have indeed become of more immediate significance than the Caribbean. It has even been argued by some strategists that, in the atomic age, the Panama Canal is no longer a lifeline for the defense of this country; that we could well afford to have it neutralized under an international authority, so great is the danger that one atomic bomb could neutralize—i.e., paralyze it—by knocking it out.

Scarcely anything, short of withdrawal of American forces from Europe and the Asiatic littoral, or the dissolution of NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) or SEATO (Southeast Asia Treaty Organization) would please the Red imperialists more than the neutralization of the Panama Canal or the transfer of its control and defense to the Republic of Panama, like the Suez Canal to Egypt. It would split our present global strategy into a two-ocean strategy and prevent the Panama Canal's being used by the West as a substitute for a blocked Suez Canal, or to relieve the burden on our flagging railway system in case of war.

The Communist conspiracy is on its toes today in Panama trying to dislodge the United States from control of this still-vital American lifeline.

The United States should make it clear to the world that in the Panama Canal Zone it will continue to act as if it were sovereign, as, indeed, it has an explicit treaty right so to do, and to stick beyond any cavil to the military defenses of that waterway.

MORE THAN THE CANAL CAN BE LOST

Much more than the canal, and all that means to American defense, can be lost. If international communism is allowed to jump the Atlantic and set up a rule in a state of the New World, the way it recently tried to leapfrog over Turkey into Syria and Lebanon, it would mean not only effective neutralization of the hemispheric lifeline in a strategic sense; it would create an active fourth front for the defense of the United States. We simply cannot allow that to happen.

Latin American Communists schooled in Moscow have studied just how to set up their system in the Americas. They tried it once already in Guatemala, while the United States stood by with arms folded around the doctrine of nonintervention, awaiting the uncertain action of a conference of foreign ministers which, thanks only to the counterrevolution of Carlos Armas, never had to meet.

When, finally, the diplomatic doctors did an autopsy on the fallen Arbenz regime in Guatemala, they found the disease of international communism to be far more deep-seated than they had suspected. In fact, it still lingers as a cancer in the body politic of honest liberalism, not only in Guatemala but in all the states of Central America and the Caribbean. It is festering now in Cuba, in Panama, in Venezuela where they spat on Vice President NIXON. The cancer is spreading.

What is there, within the inter-American peace system—pledged as it is to the doctrine of nonintervention—to prevent such a disaster in the New World?

Nonintervention is the keystone of the inter-American peace structure, put into place by the good-neighbor policy. In numerous treaties since 1933—subject to honorable denunciation by any of the parties on 1 year's and, in some cases, 2 years' notice—the American Republics have declared inadmissible the intervention of any one of them (1933, 1936) or group of them (1948) directly or indirectly or for whatever reason, within the internal affairs of another American state.

There is, however, one outstanding exception to this sweeping pledge: It does not affect existing treaty obligations. For example, it would not affect the existing treaties of the United States with Panama or Nicaragua by which the United States guarantees the protection of the Panama Canal and the Nicaraguan Canal site; it would not affect our treaty with Cuba giving us the naval base at Guantanamo; it would not affect the provisions of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, of Rio de Janeiro, of 1947.

The Rio Pact—the first regional alliance of the diplomatic revolution which now binds the United States to defensive alliances today with some 46 countries of the globe—provides for joint intervention, if two-thirds of the American States shall agree to assist in meeting an armed attack against an American State—the group acting within the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations. The treaty also provides, article 6:

"If the inviolability or the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of any American State should be affected by an aggression which is not an armed attack, or by an extracontinental or intercontinental conflict, or by any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America, the Organ of Consultation [of the Organization of American States] shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the continent."

The Rio Pact of 1947 is the same bond which brought inter-American diplomatic intervention to stop local wars between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, and between Nicaragua and Costa Rica. It is the same bond and principle which animated the meeting of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs last August, in Saniago de Chile, invoked by four Republics, including the United States—that gentle pan-American huddle which weakly empowered the Inter-American Peace Commission to watch and study military movements in the Caribbean and report to the next (11th) Conference of American States at Quito, Ecuador, in February 1960.

This is the same casus foederis [a case within the provisions of a treaty] to which appeal had been made, upon the insistence of Panama, in the case of Guatemala in 1954, for a meeting of Foreign Ministers of American States to consider the crisis of Guatemala, but did not meet because of Carlos Armas' successful counterrevolution.

Today it is very doubtful whether the Organization of American States, through its Organ of Consultation, could muster the necessary two-thirds majority of the high contracting parties quickly enough to give a mandate, under the terms of the Rio Pact of 1947, for joint intervention to suppress a Latin-American government gone Communist by infiltration of a popular-front government or capture of a liberal revolution, and thereby threatening the peace and security of the American Continent.

It might be tried, but, if it failed, what then?

There remains the Monroe Doctrine, which declares that interposition by any European powers to extend their system to any region of this hemisphere is dangerous to our own peace and safety. There remains the inherent right of self-defense, both individual and collective, even if it is not agreed on by a two-thirds majority of American States.

"We owe it [therefore] to candor," pronounced President Monroe in his famous message of December 2, 1823, "and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those [European] powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety—we could not consider any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States"—which would induce measures on the part of the United States "indispensable to their security."

An important corollary to the Monroe Doctrine since its origin—indeed, a vital dictum of the doctrine since 1869—prohibits the transfer of any colony in the New World from one European sovereign to another—lest such an occurrence upset the balance of power against the security of the United States in this hemisphere.

This "no transfer" principle has been bound up in the Monroe Doctrine throughout its history. President Grant officially proclaimed it a part of the doctrine in 1869.

A 1940 PRECEDENT FOR ACTION

As Hitler's armies were overrunning Western Europe and threatening to take over French, Dutch, and British colonies in the Western Hemisphere—i.e., Guadalupe, Martinique, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Trinidad, British Honduras, the Guianas, Aruba, etc.—a joint resolution of the U.S. Congress of June 18, 1940, signed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, implementing the sense of an earlier declaration by a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the American Republics at Panama in September 1939, at the beginning of the war, stated:

"1. That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power; and

"2. That if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States shall, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with other American Republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interests."

Shortly thereafter, a special conference of foreign ministers of the same Republics, facing the danger of Nazi conquest of Europe and England, gave a mandate to any one or more American Republics, in case of the imminent danger of transfer of colonial territory in the American continents from one European sovereign to another, to step in and act quickly to forestall such a transfer. A special convention provided for an inter-American committee to administer the government of the rescued region, pending its restoration to its inhabitants upon the return of peace.

But the Havana mandate of 1940 looks only to the actual transfer of an existing colony in America from one European sovereign to another European sovereign. It does not explicitly envisage the case of a European sovereign in fact, if not in name, extending its Communist system to a republic of the American system à la Guatemala—and will it be à la Cuba, à la Panama, à la Venezuela?

The Pact of Rio of 1947 does anticipate such a fact or situation endangering the peace and security of any republic of the New World, but it requires a two-thirds vote of the 21 republics to give a mandate to 1 or more republics to act in time to stop the danger.

It would be nice if there could issue from the 11th meeting of American States, to meet at Quito, Ecuador, in February 1960, a declaration on the lines of the Act of Havana of 1940, giving a mandate for individual or joint action to prevent the international Communist system of the Old World extending itself to an American State, directly or indirectly, and thereby threatening the peace and security of the American Republics.

It is not known whether our Department of State is endeavoring to put such a business on the agenda for the Quito Conference. It ought to be a major goal of our Government to secure this kind of declaration. Such a proposal, incidentally, would be a touchstone to reveal the degree of Communist power within the various delegations.

However, it is not likely, in the present condition of inter-American relations, that such a declaration would be accepted by even a bare majority of the states—and the emergency may be upon us even before the meeting at Quito next February. Already the Cuban dictatorship has announced its intention to buy jetplanes from inside the Iron Curtain.

The dilemma of our Latin-American policy today is whether, on the one hand, to interpret the inter-American doctrine of nonintervention so as to permit a non-American power to extend its revolutionary system to the New World by capturing a republic in the Caribbean or Central America, now within easy bombing range of the United States and of the Panama Canal; or, on the other hand, to prepare some anti-interventionist action within the framework of the inter-American peace structure that would really prevent the intervention of international communism. That is: Inter-American intervention to prevent non-American intervention, one horn of the dilemma; or the other horn of absolute nonintervention to permit the intervention of international communism to establish its system in the Western Hemisphere.

In 1940, the Congress acted promptly in the face of the danger arising from the war in Europe. Let it now pass an analogous resolution, to make it clear to our friends and enemies, all over the globe, that this Government is determined within its inherent right of self-defense, and within the purview of the pristine Monroe Doctrine, and indeed of the Pact of Rio and the inter-American peace structure, not to permit the intervention of international communism to endanger the peace and security of the United States, and of all the Republics of this hemisphere—indeed, the balance of power for freedom against slavery in the entire globe.

Such a resolution against the intervention of international communism—couched in the language of the Monroe Doctrine, the Rio Pact, and the nonintervention declarations of Washington (1951) and Caracas (1954), and the recent Declaration No. XI of Santiago (1959)—should provide for the administration of the state thus defended or rescued, by the same inter-American authority and machinery set up in the Havana Convention of 1940 for the provisional administration of European colonies and possessions in America threatened by a transfer of sovereignty.

Thus stipulated, there need be no apprehension on the part of our good neighbors that the United States would be reverting to the old system that characterized the interventions against European imperialist intervention in this hemisphere during the first quarter of our century.

Such a policy would protect the doctrine of nonintervention against the new technique of intervention by international communism, and would do so within the spirit of the inter-American peace and defense treaties. It would not wait for the accomplished fact of a leap of the Communist revolution across the Atlantic to uproot the Monroe Doctrine in the New World, as it has already destroyed the "open door" policy in China. By thus assuming the initiative in the New World, we can also defend the global balance of power on which the peace and security of the United States and of our sister Republics of America in the world must depend during the coming decade.

WHY "WAIT FOR THE BLOWS TO FALL"?

It is too much the practice of the United States, in the continuing world crisis of our time, to let the initiative rest with the enemy, to wait for the blows to fall and only then endeavor to improvise some action to fend them off.

Let something be done now, before it is too late, to deter the action. Congress ought, at the beginning of the next session in January, immediately, on the eve of the Quito Conference, to pass a joint resolution analogous to that of June 18, 1940, explicitly pointed at the present fact or situation.

If the Quito Conference doesn't back it up, then the United States, acting under the pristine Monroe Doctrine, must do so. The act of faith known as the good-neighbor policy, and the freedom of the New World—but, most essentially, the security of the United States and the blessings of liberty invoked in our Constitution—are now at stake.

EDITOR'S BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE AUTHOR

Samuel Flagg Bemis, 68, is widely recognized as an outstanding historian and authority on the diplomatic relations of the Americas.

Professor Bemis, now sterling professor of diplomatic history and inter-American relations at Yale University, has taught at many of the leading universities in the United States and in Latin America.

Among his many books is "Diplomatic History of the United States," which is regarded as a classic on the subject. Professor Bemis won the Pulitzer Prize in history in 1927. His "John Quincy Adams and the Foundations of American Foreign Policy" received the Pulitzer Prize for biography in 1950. He has been described as a scholar who has "developed a continental and hemispherical, and finally a world outlook on American history."

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 450

Whereas the subversive forces known as international communism, operating secretly and openly, directly and indirectly, threaten the sovereignty and political independence of all the Western Hemisphere nations; and

Whereas the American Continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, are not subject to colonization or domination by any power; and

Whereas the intervention of international communism, directly or indirectly, or however disguised, in any American state, conflicts with the established policy of the American Republics for the protection of the sovereignty of the peoples of such states and the political independence of their governments; and

Whereas such a situation extended to any portions of the Western Hemisphere is dangerous to the peace and safety of the whole of it, including the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring)—

(1) That any such subversive domination or threat of of it violates the principles of the Monroe Doctrine, and of collective security as set forth in the acts and resolutions heretofore adopted by the American Republics; and

(2) That in any such situation any one or more of the high contracting parties to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance may, in the exercise of individual or collective self-defense, and in accordance with the declarations and principles above stated, take steps to forestall or combat intervention, domination, control, and colonization in whatever form, by the subversive forces known as international communism and its agencies in the Western Hemisphere.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Dr. Thomas A. Dooley Receives Criss Award for Outstanding Medical Achievement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

OF OREGON

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in 1950 the Mutual of Omaha Criss Award was established by V. J. Skutt, president of Mutual of Omaha, in honor of the late Dr. C. C. Criss, founder of the company. The award consists of $10,000 and a gold medal, and is presented to the individual or individuals who, in the opinion of a distinguished board of judges, has made an outstanding contribution to public health and/or safety. This board of judges includes Dr. Charles W. Mayo, Mayo Clinic, who serves as chairman; Lt. Gen. (Ret.) James Doolittle, chairman, Space Technology Laboratories, Inc.; Irene Dunne, actress; Henry Ford, II, president, Ford Motor Co.; Philip M. Klutznick, honorary president, International B'nai B'rith; William L. Lawrence, science writer for the New York Times; Harold Lloyd, actor; Don McNeill, radio personality; Dr. Louis M. Orr, president, American Medical Association; Dr. Thomas Parran, president, Avalon Foundation; Howard Pyle, president, National Safety Council; A. E. Stoddard, president, Union Pacific Railroad; and DeWitt Wallace, editor, the Reader's Digest, all of whom have made outstanding contributions to public health and/or safety.

RECIPIENTS OUTSTANDING

Drs. Philip S. Hench and Edward C. Kendall were the first winners of the award which they shared jointly for their work in the development and use of cortisone, a drug which has great value in the control of arthritis. The second award went to a man distinguished in a number of fields, the eminent medical editor of the New York Times, Dr. Howard A. Rusk. The award was given for his outstanding success in rehabilitating the physically handicapped. In 1954, Mr. W. Earl Hall, editor of the Mason City, Iowa, Globe-Gazette, and past president and member of the National Safety Council, received the Criss Award for his distinguished work in the area of safety education. In 1955, the world famed Dr. Jonas E. Salk received the award for his selfless contribution to the development of a vaccine against polio.

Mr. President, on November 10, 1959, this distinguished group of men was joined by Dr. Thomas A. Dooley, the American doctor who has devoted his career to caring for stricken natives in the jungles of Laos and Vietnam.

I have spoken before in the Senate of the humanitarian dedication of Dr. Dooley, and I have written in magazines of this great American's courage, his skill, and tender care. Here is a man, now only 32, who has become the symbol of lifesaving, selfless Americans. He is the antithesis of "The Ugly American." His good deeds have helped conquer the barriers of custom, language, and hate—good deeds that made him become, as the President of Vietnam said, "Beloved by a whole nation." Dr. Dooley is truly a great person.

Mr. President, Dr. Thomas A. Dooley is the type of man whom our country needs for its ambassadors abroad—indeed, he is the type of man whom all humanity needs.

The Milwaukie Review, of Milwaukie, Oreg., on November 19, 1959, published a very thoughtful and eloquent editorial discussing Dr. Dooley's outstanding medical achievement, and his receipt of the Mutual of Omaha Criss Award. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the editorial from the Milwaukie Review, entitled "Another Tom Dooley," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER TOM DOOLEY

Not too long ago there was a maudlin ballad about one Tom Dooley who was about to be hanged. Teenagers adored this character. His praises were heard wherever a jukebox blared, in adoration that was never clear. This teenage idol was a killer—and stupid, to boot.

This week another Tom Dooley should have become the idol of young people everywhere. In one place, he already is. In far off Laos, young Tom Dooley, now only 32, and 27 when he first came as a naval medical officer to the Orient, has become the symbol of life-saving, self-less Americans. He is the antithesis of the "ugly American."

Not financed by the Government, in fact at first scarcely financed at all, Dooley's outpost medical aid station in the tropic, disease-infected wilderness of Asia, became the hope of life itself for men, women, and children otherwise condemned to a hideous and inevitable death.

Dr. Dooley is an angry man. A young, ordinary, ambitious graduate medical student, he did a bitter internship in the rigors of the Korean war and its aftermath of refugees, of flood, famine, and disease. He couldn't forget the misery, the need, the swollen, dying children. He went back and stayed. With modern medicine and with his own talent and that of his recruited associates, he performed miracles.

This week, young Tom Dooley, M.D., received a coveted award. An award received in the past by such as Jonas Salk. It was the Criss Award of the Mutual of Omaha Insurance Co. for outstanding medical achievement. Young Dr. Dooley had thought he would have to use the $10,000 he received to pay for his own recent cancer surgery, but that was subsidized. So he contributed it to another outpost in the wilderness, Africa.

Albert Schweitzer told Dr. Tom Dooley when he was so honored, "All the world should love you for what you do."

Hey, kids, how about this new Tom Dooley?

Citizenship Versus the Power Groups

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, during the fall recess, I had the opportunity of reading one of the most challenging critiques of the current state of the American political system that I have come across. It was an address by the Honorable George Romney, the dynamic president of American Motors Corp., to the Commonwealth Club of California. It was delivered on September 14, 1959.

The thesis of Mr. Romney's excellent address is that economic power or pressure groups have all but taken over from the individual citizen the control and direction of our political system and institutions. This power grab by the power groups, as Mr. Romney sees it, involves both of our great political parties. He seems to fear that the arena of American politics has, to a large and dangerous degree, become the exclusive battleground of big labor versus big corporations. The rights of the individual citizen and the general welfare of the country have been ignored in this battle of the giants.

Mr. Romney has an answer for the dilemma facing the American political system. He urges a revival and resurgence of participation and responsibility by the individual citizen in the political affairs of the Nation. This is the only hope for cutting the big power groups down to size.

Mr. President, I have long been alarmed by the growing power and influence of the political pressure groups over our Government. I have warned time and again that these groups are exerting power and influence out of all proportion to the numbers they purport to represent. Even worse, they callously disregard the general welfare of the country as a whole in the interest of their own selfish and narrow end.

Mr. President, these pressure groups do not confine their activities to the economic field; they operate in virtually every area of our national life. They appeal to the noble instincts of our people, to their patriotism, their devotion to their country, and the like; while actually they are seeking to impose their selfish philosophy on the Government.

I am delighted to hear an outstanding American business leader speak out frankly and courageously against the growing menace of the pressure groups. Mr. Romney's Commonwealth Club remarks amount to a ringing call to citizenship. I believe every Member of this body could profit by reading Mr. Romney's remarks and I therefore ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITIZENSHIP VERSUS THE POWER GROUPS

(By George Romney, president, American Motors Corp.)

Some years ago, Justice Brandeis, one of the most thoughtful and probing observers of the American scene, declared:

"It is not good for us that we should ever lose the fighting quality, the stamina, and the courage to battle for what we want when we are entitled to it."

Today, I think we have lost a great deal of that "fighting quality." The majority of our people have few flaming interests that they are willing to struggle for. In many important areas of our national life, the individual is being engulfed in vast organizations and power groups. In larger and larger numbers, he is transferring his rights of citizenship to the corporation or the union, or idly watching his responsibilities drift to Washington.

To a very large extent, the people owe their security to corporations or unions which are concerned with the most important single interest that individuals can gain from such association—the individual's economic interest. As long as this is reasonably secure, people have no burning interest that would move them actively into political participation. On the contrary, large numbers of them consider it safer to be nonpolitical.

Without personal interests or convictions, they remain nonpolitical because the ways in which politics operate on them are so generalized and so remote that they consider it all but impossible to interfere.

There are three major dangers from this renunciation of politics:

If the people as citizens are unable to fill the role in politics traditionally assigned to them, we will be confronted with a vacuum in political power and leadership.

Impersonal economic interests are replacing and eliminating political and citizenship interests. The substitution of economic citizenship for direct political citizenship could be the doom of our way of life.

Parallel economic and political conflict would destroy the social unity vital to society as a whole.

Today, I would like to deal with these fundamental problems. As the basis of discussion, let's review briefly the established principles of our American democracy.

First, the moral principles.

1. The rights and basic responsibilities of man are derived from the Creator, in whose eyes each man is an individual, created with equal rights and responsibilities and in perpetual brotherhood.

2. Each man in meeting his responsibilities has the right to all freedom that does not infringe on the rights of others.

3. Freedom can be a reality only with separation of church and state. Religious freedom is the key to all the others. If the civil and ecclesiastical governments were joined, the latter would necessarily have to dominate, since it could point to an authority higher than the people.

4. The state derives all of its authority from the people and should be responsive to their control.

With the moral principles established, the mechanics of the social order become the prime consideration, requiring basic agreement among citizens as to principles of government.

I believe these are the essential elements of that agreement:

1. A system of representative democracy most effectively insures individual liberty.

2. Government must limit itself to those rights specifically assigned to it by the governed.

3. The authority of government should be divided to provide cross-checking and dispersion of power.

4. Government should be as close as possible to the people it serves, therefore State and local governments should have adequate responsibility.

5. The people assume responsibilities to be met by voluntary means, in order to avoid excessive reliance on government and the consequent abridgement of liberty to obey or disobey their Creator.

6. The mainsprings of progress should be individual action or the voluntary cooperative action of free individuals.

7. The state should do for the people only those things they cannot do at all or as well for themselves, either individually or in cooperation with each other.

8. Economic and nonreligious social institutions derive their authority from the people and should be responsive to their control. As organizational magnitude and complexity grow, the state becomes for the people a joint instrument of economic and social control. Properly used, the purpose of the state is to maintain the ability of the people to exercise direct ultimate control—as in the case of economic control through antimonopoly laws to enforce competition.

9. The exercise of direct ultimate economic and social control by the people requires the division and dispersion of economic and social power. Power concentration in one place fosters it in others. It diminishes control by the people, and thereby limits their freedom, responsibility, and development.

Taken together—these moral principles and principles of government are the foundation stones of our society; the authority of the Creator * * * the sanctity of the individual * * * the brotherhood of man * * * the state as the creature and servant of man * * * the dispersion of power, that freedom may be insured * * * that men should compete and cooperate and be rewarded on the basis of what they contribute to society.

Have these principles changed in any way? I can't see that they have. But circumstances change, affecting not the validity of the principles but their freedom to work. When the system fails in some degree or another, it is not the fallacy of principle but the failure of techniques or the failure of men.

Our techniques will continue to fail from time to time if we freeze them, if we fail to recognize that the American Revolution is a continuing process of applying our basic principles to new problems that arise out of new experience. The fact that new problems arise is in itself almost sufficient proof of the strength of the system, which is fluid rather than static. It produces new successes, new situations and, naturally, new challenges. As Whitman observed, the fruition of each success brings these new challenges, making a still greater struggle necessary.

In the early days of our Nation, it was hardly possible to foresee that our revolution would also embrace other revolutions, particularly in technology. Nor was it possible to anticipate our phenomenal growth, our ascendancy to world power, the enormous economic changes, the growth of the corporation and union concepts * * *. To name only these, is it possible to conceive of an ideal inflexible system? Or to deny the living character of our revolution?

Failure to modernize our techniques as we have moved along has created some severe problems, none of which, in my opinion, has exceeded the problem of power concentration.

This strikes at our basic principles. We fought against the power concentration that made our liberty and independence impossible. The weak state of the original Confederation reflected the peoples' fear of concentrated authority. The Constitution itself, while providing for a strong central government, bristles with safeguards against excessive power held in the hands of a few. Jefferson defeated Hamilton and his ideas, Jackson defeated the Bank of the United States, Teddy Roosevelt defeated the trusts, Franklin Roosevelt divided the power of big finance and big business. We are ignoring the problem when we allow the Federal Government, or unions and industry to assume too much responsibility.

I think one of the most regrettable aspects of American life today is a situation in which union power and employer power can be concentrated to the point that an industry which is basic to the economic welfare of the total nation can be shut down as a result of the position of either group. I think that is an unheard-of concentration of private economic power. I think it's going to be impossible to solve the economic problems of this country without dealing with that hard reality of excess economic power. I think any time we permit a few men in labor or a few men in industry to reach the point where they can cripple the economy and adversely affect the public interest, we have created a condition completely contrary to the spirit of America. The employer and union power in the steel strike is a present example. I do not agree that it will impress Khrushchev favorably. I think it will impress him as an abusive exercise of excess private economic power.

When I have discussed concentration in labor and industry on previous occasions, some have remarked that I am seeking increased government regulation. Quite the contrary. We do not need more law but modern law. Neither our labor laws nor our anti-trust laws are up to date. Bear this in mind: when law is not clear or specific or up-to-date, either the problems grow or the intervention of government must necessarily be increased. Vague and outmoded laws are difficult to observe and to enforce. Our present anti-trust laws make their criterion the intent to use power wrongfully—opening up an endless field of litigation and legal interpretation. How can intent be proven and judged with accuracy in the field of business? As in the case of our Constitutional safeguards, the criterion should be the ability to wield power to excess. In the case of labor, our inconsistent laws encourage the fostering of labor monopoly and the creation of a concentration of power that could be matched only by a massive coalition of industrial power. The collision between these two excessive forces is confronting us with the necessity of intervention of government to protect the people as consumers—and the end result of the road we are on will be some form of totalitarianism.

The attitude of outspoken people toward highly centralized government may be divided generally into three categories: those who believe in the idea of social "drift" that, like a raft on a Gulf stream, society will somehow get where it's going. Another view is that big centralized governments are necessary for big societies, and that comfortable countervailing forces will keep the balance. A third view is that concentration of power ought to be fought wherever it exists or the individual will be smashed—one way or another.

I take the latter view. Certainly big societies, especially those in competition with other big societies, need strong—even big—governments and strong—even big—unions and corporations. But their power can and must be dispersed. The ultimate control can and must be in the hands of the people.

This will be impossible unless we recognize that it is morally and economically wrong for either unions as unions or corporations as corporations to get into politics directly or indirectly.

To me, it is wrong for the very simple reason that it is wrong for any American to transfer his personal rights of citizenship to an institution, and wrong for an institution to act in any way to encourage the relinquishing of such rights.

There is little difference in principle between the present excessive political influence of unions and the earlier excessive political influence of business denounced by both Roosevelts. One excess is as wrong as the other. Both are obstacles to political freedom, economic justice, and individual development. The creation of union power was a desirable offset to business power. Economic power is better distributed now between unions and business than it was earlier when exercised largely by business. Current union political activity does not differ in principle from earlier business political activity. Unions can try to justify their programs on that basis, but the question is whether in a democracy based on political freedom and the rights of the individual, economic organizations should be permitted to participate directly or indirectly in political affairs.

Let me be clear. I am not referring to individual union leaders or members participating in political activity. I do not mean individual business leaders or white-collar employees participating in political activity. Nor unions or businesses presenting economic facts to political bodies or to private citizens' groups. What I am talking about is direct or indirect political activity on the part of economic organizations, whether they are union organizations, business organizations, or other organized forms of economic endeavor.

Before church and state were separated, unquestionably church participation in politics and government exerted a direct influence on the political attitudes of church members. Similarly, political activity by a company is likely to cause an executive to feel that his economic opportunity in the enterprise is affected by his political support of company political thinking. Conversely, the attitude of many American businesses has resulted in political inactivity on the part of its executives.

The same thing is true of unions. How could union members or union officers fail to feel that their treatment by the union would be affected by conformity or opposition to union political programs?

I believe we must prohibit economic organizations from direct or indirect political activity and expenditures. What right have they to use the funds of stockholders or members to support specific political candidates or partisan issues? What right has either to create an atmosphere where a member's or employee's economic status can possibly be thought to depend on his political views and convictions—as long as they conform to the basic principles on which our free society depends to protect individual freedom and inalienable rights?

With the difficulty being experienced in securing competent candidates for local, State and even some Federal offices, it is obvious we must overcome the lack of political participation by individuals, whether they be corporate employees or union members. I believe that corporate officials and union officials should participate personally, as individuals, in political affairs * * * but I think they should take every possible step to assure members and employees that this right is a personal right not to be abridged in any manner, and to encourage others to use it.

We must bring back to life the feeling that each individual can participate with effectiveness.

One businessman wrote me the following question: "How can a public-spirited individual be effective or influential unless his energies are combined with similar energies of other individuals?"

He cannot. He must work with others. But his work must be personal and direct, not by proxy. He must be directed by what he believes in, not what his corporation or his union believes in. He must speak for himself, and not suffer his voice to be drowned in the loudspeaker of an institution. The instrument available to him for the combination of his effort with those of others is the political party, when the party system is functioning properly.

Unfortunately, our political parties at present have given victory at the polls such engulfing preeminence that neither will take a position that might offend any sizable segment of voters. The result is a close similarity between stated party objectives, with very little choice left to the voter. Attention is focused on money and organization power rather than broad citizen participation and sincere spontaneous support.

The parties have allowed themselves to a large extent to become the captives of dominant economic groups. In Michigan, for example, one party is largely under the control of big labor, while the other is largely in the hands of big business. The dominance of these power groups, expressed through organizations and not individual citizens, resulted in a 7-month deadlock that thwarted the progress of the State. The individual has a sense of frustration and helplessness.

To combat this, we are developing a nonpartisan citizens' program identified as Citizens for Michigan. It is made up of individuals acting for themselves and not as representatives of any organization of any type.

Through this effort, we hope, first, to establish a means by which an influence greater than the minority economic groups now dominating our two political parties can be created; second, to acquaint enough citizens with the facts on the State's problems and the means for their solution to secure essential political and governmental action; and, third, to restore citizen belief in the effectiveness of individual political participation.

The success of our program can provide the basis for releasing the political parties from their captivity and restoring to the people these necessary instruments for self-government.

To encourage an increase in political participation, we must have two political parties with programs and methods that provide the people a clear choice. At least one should be devoted to the interest and welfare of all Americans. At least one should be more dedicated to the principles of human liberty and justice than to political victory at any cost through economic power, subsidy and advantage.

Individuals of character and principle, working as free citizens with others of like mind and purpose, can achieve this. Individuals working politically as units of business or labor can only intensify special interest party domination and increase the magnitude and scope of our present economic conflict, while personally giving up the rights, responsibilities and respect of citizenship.

There are three important things we must do to stop the drift toward increasingly massive centralized government.

One, to make certain, by modernized law, that power outside government is dispersed and kept dispersed. Surely the principal way to reduce the size and power of centralized government is to disperse power that only big government can hold in check and increase the influence and control exercised directly by the people.

Two, to improve the character of State governments and modernize the smaller government units, such as the parish or the county, that were set up on the basis of travel and population distribution in a frontier country.

Three, to revive the political participation of the people in control of the government by dramatic steps that would bring back to life the feeling that they can participate with effectiveness.

The most effective means of putting some hope and zest back into political participation would be for the political parties to reject economic power group participation, reach out for citizenship participation, put less emphasis on dollars and more emphasis on people. The give-a-dollar-to-the-party-of your-choice campaigns would be more effective with a give-an-hour campaign. The method today is too much one of guarded exclusion rather than participation. The parties are not going to get participation if the people feel they have no opportunity to choose anything but the word that is passed from the smoke-filled room. Widely publicized open forum-type meeting would put excitement and opportunity back into the political area at the local level.

Participation on an effective basis would arouse the interest of people who are today without interest. It would simulate people to take stands on issues and it would generate issues. One of our problems today is issueless politics, with a tragic simplicity between party positions that give the voter little choice. How can a citizen help but vacillate between parties and be ill attracted to either in such circumstances?

We need to bring our political parties and the people together, if our democratic system is to continue to be truly representative. When the people have no choice, they are powerless to act, and control is defaulted to willful power groups that can be arrogantly unaccountable to a listless electorate.

Today, the power groups are rapidly extending control over the people, the political parties and the state. The individual must use his citizenship to bring the power groups under control, not primarily through the state but primarily through making them responsive to the people. The unions should be primarily responsive to the control of citizens who are members. The corporations should be primarily responsive to the control of citizens who are stockholders and consumers. The citizen must fight for his citizenship, or he will find himself enslaved by the power groups or an all powerful state that is exercising his inalienable rights on the premise that the state must protect him from the excesses of the power groups. The internal struggle of our age is citizenship versus the power groups.

When Franklin D. Roosevelt talked to your club on September 23, 1932, he discussed the necessity of curbing the barons of business, as it had once been necessary to curb the barons of feudalism. He led in releasing the forces that created the barons of unionism. This division of power was better than its unilateral exercise, but the existence of two sets of barons and their widening contest for economic, political, and social power threatens our future at home and abroad. The union barons and the business barons must be curbed anew. When both are so strong that separately or jointly they can jeopardize the interests and rights of the Nation as a whole, citizens are face to face with the age-old struggle to keep power in any form from becoming excessive.

We need to reawaken the idea, I believe, that America has some important unfinished business. The American Revolution was not a distant explosion from which the dust has long since settled. It is a continuing process, and we should never forget this.

We must continue our revolution by restoring faith in the individual and helping the individual to restore faith in himself and his citizenship.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I merely wish to supplement what the distinguished Senator from Georgia has said with respect to George Romney, the president of American Motors. He is not only one of the most courageous and dynamic and forthright leaders in American industry, but some years ago George Romney was associated with one of the senatorial committees, as I recall.

I remember that when he appeared before the Judiciary Committee at one time, he made some observations with reference to his committee experience on Capitol Hill. Therefore he sees the whole picture, not only from the standpoint of industry, but also from the basis of his experience in the legislative branch as a sort of working member of a committee. I share the high esteem which the distinguished Senator from Georgia has of Mr. Romney.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not recall ever having met Mr. Romney, although it is entirely likely that he was associated with a committee during the time that I have served in the Senate. It so happens that during the adjournment of the Senate I have more time to spend in my office than I am able to do when the Senate is in session, and therefore have more time to read material which comes to my desk. I read Mr. Romney's speech, and it impressed me tremendously.

I am confident that he points to one of the real threats to our system of government. It is the fact that the pressure groups operate in almost every area of our life, and in doing so they make more noise and receive more credit and claim more strength than they are entitled to, and exercise more influence on the operation of our Government and on the making our laws and the enforcement of our laws than their numbers and the merits of their case would justify.

Economic Trends, Labor and Management Conferences, and the Steel Strike Settlement—Address by the Secretary of Labor

OF

Hon. EVERETT McKINLEY DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address by the Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell, before the Economic Club of Detroit, today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF LABOR JAMES P. MITCHELL BEFORE THE ECONOMIC CLUB OF DETROIT, DETROIT, MICH., JANUARY 11, 1960

Mr. Chairman, members of the Detroit Economic Club, distinguished guests, some 2 years ago I was invited to luncheon with you and, as some you may recall, I had to do it at that time by telephone, neither nutritious nor personally satisfactory.

I am happy to be here myself this time, and I want to thank you for again extending an invitation to me.

I have been asked to speak on the question: "Where are we and where do we go from here in the labor-management relations?"

I don't think that I can return a responsive answer to that question without indicating first what I believe to be important evolutionary changes in our economic life. For labor-management relations exist in a context of change.

It seems that the evolution of our economic life is leading toward larger concentrations of economic power within institutions—power based not on the ownership of wealth but on the control of wealth.

These institutions are various: corporations, of which 500 now account for two-thirds of our total industry; pension and trust funds, already totaling some $40 billion and growing at the rate of $4 billion annually; labor unions, supported by 16 million members; mutual funds, trusts, insurance and banking firms and so on.

It has been estimated that 50 million citizens are now sharing in the profits of the 500 largest corporations, directly and indirectly. Since 1952, the number of direct stockholders in public corporations has risen from 6.5 million to 12.5 million.

In the United States more and more people are enjoying greater and greater degrees of wealth.

At the same time, the control of economic wealth is concentrated in greater degree in our economic institutions, and in the hands of the managers, administrators and leaders of those institutions.

Outside a free society, this might be a dangerous condition, but inside a free society it has an opposite effect; it places in the hands of private citizens both the power and the resources to attain the social and economic goals they set for themselves.

A free society, has within itself the weapon to curb injustice that might result from a selfish or blind use of economic power; that weapon is the political power that the people have reserved for themselves.

We are all familiar with the use of political intervention, from antitrust laws through the regulation of transportation and broadcasting the regulation of labor-management affairs.

Intervention usually results when economic institutions have not lived up to the responsibilities that society has expected of them, either through incompetence or willful mismanagement and abuse of control.

We have, in America, a rapidly growing society, one with impressive needs, and even more impressive wants.

America will be looking to its private institutions to initiate and support positive programs for social and economic advancement.

At the same time intervention by political power has the latent danger of sapping the vitality of private responsibility, frustrating private initiative, and, most importantly, creating a drift toward vesting government with more and more controls over private affairs.

When political power and economic power are joined, as they are in Russia, it can be devastating to the ambitions of freedom.

At the same time, the vigorous and expanding society of tomorrow will not hesitate, I believe, to exert its political power if the needs and the wants the people feel are not met by private means.

That is one of the reasons why it was all-important that the recent steel strike be settled voluntarily—to preserve these vital institutions from political regulation.

And that is one of the reasons why more has to be done in the private sector to solve the social needs represented by the older worker, by the minority group—and on down a long list of problems waiting for remedies.

I disagree vigorously with those who believe that government is the only institution committed by nature to a forwarding of the common good.

We have estimated, at the Department of Labor, that the population of the United States will increase to 226 million by 1975. The labor force in that period will grow to 95 million, an increase of 23 million. Eight million of that increase will be men and women over 45 years of age.

At present, because of senseless prejudices, because of changes in business technology, the older worker is often excluded from employment. He finds that his age has erected invisible barriers around him, cutting him off from participation in the active economic life of his society.

Well, whose problem is this?

Is it the problem only of the mature worker himself, and one that he can meet only by recourse to his political power?

In New York and in other States there are now laws on the books that prohibit discrimination in employment because of age. Is it possible, unless the managers and the leaders of our centers of private economic power realize that this is their problem too, that a national law might someday be on the books—and it will be there not because the Government is seeking to control but because millions of people, frustrated in their desire to join into society in an active way, have demanded such control.

The fact that this economy will be called upon for a maximum response to meet domestic needs and international commitments makes it plain that the maximum utilization of human resources is not a choice but an imperative.

And it is plain to me that business management and labor unions have prime responsibility to get this job done.

A corporation must exist for larger ends than the mere accumulation of profit, the production of goods or the payment of wages. It must also use its economic power to further national goals and serve society's purposes.

It can't do this of it has, for example, discriminatory employment policies in regard to minority workers.

It can't do this if color is made a condition of employment.

I think you will agree with me that the clamor for general use of political power to meet social ends is based on a vote of no-confidence in the ability, and the intention, of the private sector of our economy to assume the responsibility.

I do not mean to give here the impression that the private and public powers stand at opposite poles. On many of the social needs of today they must join. Certainly the problems afflicting those areas of chronic unemployment require such a dual approach—legislation by government and action by the private economy.

The older worker, the minority worker, the area of chronic unemployment—add to these urban renewal, educational facilities, civil rights, housing and health. These, and many more, are problems of total society, and total society solves them in its own way, using the instrument that works best.

I believe that the concentrations of economic power in America have a responsibility to the common good, and that many of our needs can best be met through the exercise and the initiative of that private responsibility.

This is one of the reasons why there must be wider, better, more profound, more continuous communication between those in whom the power to control resides.

Last Thursday, in his state of the Union address, the President spoke of "voluntary, dependable, abiding cooperation among the important segments of our own free society."

Such cooperation rests upon voluntary, dependable, and abiding communication.

The time for labor and management to start talking to one another is now.

To forward this end, I have been suggesting for some time now that labor and management provide a means for communication outside the bargaining table. I suggested this need to the construction industry when I met with them in New York a few years ago, and I am happy to see that a committee has been formed within that industry, with representatives from labor and management, to address itself to mutual problems.

The President announced last week that it was his intention to "encourage regular discussions between labor and management outside the bargaining table to consider the interests of the public as well as their mutual interests in the maintenance of industrial peace, price stability, and economic growth."

We hope to encourage labor and management themselves to begin communicating with each other. For in order for anything practically useful and sound to come from such communication, it seems to me that the parties themselves must first want to communicate.

Without that desire for understanding, without that condition of good will, they are "doomed before they take the vow."

Certainly none of you sitting here this afternoon need an engraved invitation from the White House to talk out mutual problems with your employees or your employer.

It is true that the Government has been talking, and will continue to talk, with men in both labor and management, encouraging them to get together. It is my hope that this encouragement will prompt the representatives of labor and management to initiate conferences in every industry—without waiting for Washington to fire the starting gun.

The advantages of open, continuous communications outside bargaining are, it seems to me, clear. Problems not susceptible to bargaining can here be met—the impact of research and development on employment, any practices that may be detrimental to labor or to management or to an entire industry, the impact of foreign competition and the maintenance of a high order of productivity. I am sure that many things come immediately to your minds as well.

And I would hope, finally, that out of these industry conversations, both labor and management will agree to the principle that owners, workers, and consumers are all entitled to a fair share of the fruits of increasing productivity.

And, in line with my previous remarks, it would be a demonstration that the public welfare can be forwarded by private interest.

It is my hope that eventually the bargaining table will become not an isolated battleground upon which hereditary opponents infrequently meet for an often-bitter Indian wrestle over the size of shares but the logical culmination of a continuously developed understanding, where the public interest and the welfare of the industry find their formal expression and their most positive fulfillment.

I was pleased that the steel agreement provides for a Human Relations Research Committee that will recommend solutions to mutual problems in the areas of wage and benefit adjustment, job classification, wage incentives, seniority and medical care.

In regard to the total steel settlement, there have been many misleading reports as to its cost.

I am sure that all of you are interested in the cost aspect of the settlement, and I would like to clarify it for you.

Mr. Roger Blough, chairman of the board of United States Steel, has said that the average annual increase in hourly employment costs resulting from this settlement will be 3.5 to 3.75 percent.

This is in contrast to other steel settlements during the postwar period, during which hourly employment costs have been rising, according to Mr. Blough, at an average of 8 percent a year.

The steel companies and the steel union, in the present settlement, have cut the postwar trend by half.

A comparison of the average annual increase in hourly earnings between the steel and other major settlements shows the following:

Aluminum, 5.2 percent; can, 4.5 percent; Kaiser, 3.82 percent; steel, 3.75 percent.

When compared with other wage settlements reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1950, the steel wage increase of 7 cents—which does not go into effect until next December—is less than the average. As a matter of fact, 65 percent of wage increases in 1959 exceed that figure.

What this means is that the steel wage settlement is in line with others negotiated this year, and thus cannot set off a wage pattern with highly inflationary effects, as has happened sometimes in the past.

A great part of the misunderstanding about this settlement is due to news accounts that failed completely to take into account the fact that the steel settlement has been described in terms of total employment costs while other major settlements have been described in terms of wages and benefits to employees.

Thus, to say that the reported steel package of 39 cents is comparable to the reported aluminum package of 28.2 cents is not only untrue but meaningless. The steel package figure describes total employment costs to the companies; the other is a description only of the wages and benefits received by employees.

Mr. R. Conrad Cooper, in comparing recent major settlements in terms of employment costs, said: "* * * the effect on our employment cost of the contractual arrangements we made is from 3½ to 3¾ percent per year. We estimate the can, aluminum, and Kaiser settlements would have approximated 4½ to 5 percent if they had been accepted by the steel industry, or nearly 30 percent more."

On the basis of this settlement—I am convinced that if management and labor mutually seek, as I know they will, to increase the rate of productivity in the steel industry, Mr. Blough's statement that there will be no price increase at present will be good for some time to come.

Certainly no one can predict price stability indefinitely because other cost factors than wages enter into the determination of price policy.

With good will and good sense, and with awareness that an economic institution like a steel corporation or a labor union must serve the public interest as fully as its own interests, it could be possible—on the basis of this settlement—that the United States will have seen its last major steel strike.

It has always been the pride of our people that we have been worthy of freedom. That is because we have turned power to the use and the betterment of the individual; we have made free decision and voluntary cooperation the touchstones of a system that serves and honors the highest ends of society—the elevation of each man toward wider horizons.

The issue before us is the old test of freedom with the new forms of power. It is an issue we should meet with full confidence in our private institutions, and in the ideals of reliance and service that have brought us successfully to this new decade. Thank you.

A Review of the Activities of the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy During the 1st Session of the 86th Congress and a Look Into the Future

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure to attend the meeting of the nuclear energy committee of the National Association of Manufacturers held in New York City, at 10 a.m., on Friday, October 23, 1959.

The program consisted of a review of NAM policies in the nuclear field and a general discussion of the Federal-State relationships in this field.

During the course of the program, as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, I delivered the following address in which I discussed the activities of the Joint Committee during the 1st session of the 86th Congress as well as the prospects for the 2d session.

The address follows:

REMARKS BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE THE NUCLEAR ENERGY COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS, OCTOBER 23, 1959

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the distinguished chairman of your nuclear energy committee, Mr. Fairman, in his letter of invitation, suggested that I speak today on the activities of the Joint Committee during the 1st session of the 86th Congress as well as the prospects for the 2d session.

With all due respect to your distinguished chairman, I believe he has given me quite a large order.

As you will see, the activities of the Joint Committee during 1959 ranged all the way from radioisotopes to reactors, and from the genetic effects of fallout to the fine print in insurance policies.

Our committee held hearings on waste disposal, employee radiation hazards, workmen's compensation, patents, liability, Federal-State relationships, atomic power, new weapons, nuclear war, our nuclear submarine program, and a host of other subjects.

The testimony varied from atomic energy regulations in local communities all the way to international atoms-for-peace agreements, Euratom, and the Geneva negotiations with the Russians for cessation of nuclear weapons tests.

Our committee, and its various subcommittees, held a total of 84 public hearings and 77 hearings and meetings in executive session.

Some 25 publications, consisting of reports and hearings were printed by the Joint Committee during the first session, amounting to over 11,000 pages.

And so I say, Mr. Chairman, you have given me a fairly good sized order.

But, with your indulgence, I will try to touch briefly on most of the activities of the Joint Committee during this past session, and then look into my crystal ball for 1960, as you requested.

I am very glad to begin with the 1959 amendment to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 to permit greater participation by State and local governments in regulating the atom, because I understand it is on your agenda this morning.

The 1946 and 1954 Atomic Energy Acts both set forth comprehensive frameworks for regulation of the atom by the Federal Government, but were silent as to the role of State and local governments.

As the peacetime uses of atomic energy spread throughout the country, a growing crescendo of interest by State and local officials developed.

In particular, radioisotopes began to find more and more applications in the fields of biology and medicine, agriculture, and industry.

By 1959 the AEC had outstanding over 4,500 radioisotope licensees, spread throughout our 50 States and in almost every community.

In May of 1959, the Joint Committee held 4 days of public hearings and received testimony from representatives of the AEC, Public Health Service, State and local governments, industry, and labor.

As a result of these hearings, the Joint Committee made a number of changes in the bill originally proposed by the AEC.

After a number of committee meetings, we then unanimously reported out the bill, with amendments, together with our committee report.

Let me quote briefly from some of the comments of the Joint Committee in its report:

"2. The approach of the bill is considered appropriate, in the opinion of the Joint Committee, for several reasons:

"(a) The approach is on a State-by-State basis. * * * The bill does not authorize a wholesale relinquishment or abdication by the Commission of its regulatory responsibilities but only a gradual, carefully considered turnover, on a State-by-State basis, as individual States may become qualified.

"(b) The bill applies to some, but not all, atomic energy activities now regulated exclusively by AEC."

It applies principally to radioisotopes, whose use and present licensing by AEC is widespread, but whose hazard is local and limited.

Licensing and regulation of more dangerous activities—such as nuclear reactors—will remain the exclusive responsibilty of the Commission.

When the bill was considered on the floor of the House, it was my privilege, together with my colleague, Representative MELVIN PRICE, of Illinois, to explain its purposes and intent to the other Members of the House.

After explaining some of the provisions, I summarized for the House as follows:

"In summary, Mr. Speaker, this bill would help the States assume independent regulatory jurisdiction in areas which are now regulated exclusively by the Federal Government under the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act.

"It would assist the States to prepare themselves for assuming such responsibility by increased training and programs of assistance for the States.

"As pointed out in the Joint Committee report, this would increase the protection of the public health and safety because most citizens look to their local health officers for advice and protection against hazardous materials used in the community."

I am happy to say that the House, as well as the Senate, passed the bill in the form recommended by the Joint Committee.

It was signed by President Eisenhower on September 23, 1959, as Public Law 86-373, and is now the law of the land.

The AEC is developing regulations under the new law and has entered into discussions with representatives of at least one State (New York) leading, we hope, to an agreement whereby that State will begin to assume some of the regulatory responsibilities of atomic energy applications.

I think most of you will agree with me that this new law to shift some responsibility out of Washington and to the States represents an important and healthy development.

All of us realize that it is going to take a number of years to develop commercially atomic energy, especially atomic power.

But some day we will have atomic power stations, as well as research reactors and radioisotopes, spread throughout the country.

It's time now for our State and local governments to start preparing to assume increased responsibilities in understanding and controlling this new force.

I would like to emphasize three things about this legislation.

First, it attempts to provide, for any given operation, that either the Federal Government will be responsible, or the State government, but not both.

From the point of view of industry, this should tend to prevent over regulation.

The Joint Committee put it this way:

"3. It is not intended to leave any room for the exercise of dual or concurrent jurisdiction by States to control radiation hazards by regulating byproduct, source, or special nuclear materials. The intent is to have the material regulated and licensed either by the Commission, or by the State and local governments, but not by both."

Secondly, the bill, as amended, tries to encourage uniform standards.

On this point the Joint Committee said:

"5. The Joint Committee believes it important to emphasize that the radiation standards adopted by States under the agreements of this bill should either be identical or compatible with those of the Federal Government. The committee recognizes the importance of the testimony before it by numerous witnesses of the dangers of conflicting, overlapping, and inconsistent standards in different jurisdictions, to the hindrance of industry and jeopardy of public safety."

Third, this is only the first step toward increasing State and local responsibility.

The committee's final comment, number 7, in its report was:

"7. The bill recognizes that this is interim legislation. The committee believes that the uses of atomic energy will be so widespread in future years that States should continue to prepare themselves for increased responsibilities."

Related to, and prior to, the Federal-State hearings, the Joint Committee held hearings on industrial radioactive waste disposal, and also on employee radiation hazards.

Disposal of radioactive wastes from reactors is recognized as one of the growing problems in atomic energy.

We therefore wanted to assess the extent of the hazards, the quantities of wastes being generated now and estimated in the future, and explore the new research on treatment and disposal now underway in our AEC laboratories.

We held 5 days of hearings and received testimony from 52 scientists and experts working in this field.

As finally printed, the waste disposal hearings, including the technical papers for the record, run over 3,000 pages in length, and consist of four volumes.

They are without a doubt the most complete library yet compiled on this important subject.

I have copies of our committee's summary analysis of the hearings here with me if any of you would like one.

The hearings in March on employee radiation hazards also explored workmen's compensation problems.

In the past, workmen's compensation has always been handled at the State level, but there are suggestions now that a Federal workmen's compensation law for radiation injuries should be considered.

We found certain areas of agreement and certain areas of disagreement growing out of our hearings.

We then listed 10 possible future courses of action in the summary-analysis which we prepared after the hearings.

The Joint Committee took no action on this subject this year, but it will no doubt be before us again when we return in January.

The Joint Committee also held hearings this year on insurance and liability problems.

Nuclear reactors are designed with every possible safety device and precaution, and the record of the AEC and industry in operating reactors to date has been fantastically safe.

However, there is always the remote possibility of an accident which could cost hundreds of millions of dollars of damage.

Private insurance companies managed to put together pools totaling $50 or $60 million.

Above that amount, the Congress in 1957 enacted, as recommended by our committee, the so-called Price-Anderson amendments to the Atomic Energy Act to provide governmental indemnity and limitation of liability.

This year we reviewed the operation of these indemnity amendments, including international liability problems, and possible insurance and indemnity coverage for nuclear powered merchant ships.

In general, the indemnity amendments seem to be working well.

There has been no major reactor accident, and no call upon the governmental indemnity funds.

The best insurance, of course, is preventive insurance, and to this end we receive an annual report from the members of the advisory committee on reactor safeguards.

One bad accident would set this industry back many years in terms of public confidence.

We must continue our efforts to prevent this possibility.

After hearings on liability and reactor safety, we held hearings on fallout.

We read in the papers every day about the dangers of radioactive fallout, and it is a difficult subject to evaluate.

In 1957 the Joint Committee held voluminous hearings on this subject and in 1959 we wanted to bring ourselves up to date.

We therefore heard statements from the leading scientists and experts in the field as to the hazards, and as to our program to protect the public against fallout.

The Joint Committee then prepared a summary-analysis of these hearings, following our usual practice.

In general, I think we are in agreement that the fallout caused by debris from past bomb tests, both on the ground and still in the atmosphere, does not constitute a hazard to our public.

If we were to resume atmospheric tests, however, levels of strontium 90 could become uncomfortably high.

We said in our report:

"Thus for testing already conducted, man's exposure to fallout radiation is and will be relatively small compared to the normal background radiation or the standard recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP).

"Assuming successive cycles of testing over the next two generations or less, following the same pattern as the past 5 years, the predicted average concentration in bone will be about 48 strontium units.

"This is close enough to the maximum permissible body burden of 67 strontium units recommended by the ICRP to suggest that a hazard to the world's population could result during this period."

This suggests the advisability of tests underground rather than in the atmosphere.

This is, of course, one aspect of the prolonged and difficult negotiations with the Russians now taking place in Geneva.

Many military experts believe we may need to resume testing in order to improve our weapons program, including development of small, low-yield tactical weapons.

If the President should decide that we need to resume testing in the interests of national defense, it may be possible to reach an agreement with the Russians to conduct all future nuclear tests underground.

I think we would be willing to do this, and underground tests cause no fallout, of course.

But we have been talking with the Russians on this subject for almost a year now, and it is difficult to predict what, if anything, they will agree to.

Our final hearings this year were on the biological and environmental effects of a hypothetical nuclear war.

For the purposes of the hearings, the subcommittee set up an assumed attack pattern of nuclear weapons by an enemy against the United States.

We received testimony from military and civil defense experts, medical doctors and scientists.

After the hearings, the joint committee met to discuss the results.

Our summary-analysis of these hearings on the effects of a nuclear war are also available, and if any of you would like a copy, I will be glad to send one to you.

I think that you would find it very interesting reading.

The attack pattern assumed for the purposes of the hearings was that the enemy had delivered 263 nuclear weapons in 1, 2, 3, 8 and 10 megaton sizes, with a total yield of 1,446 megatons on 224 targets within the United States.

An additional 2,500 megatons were assumed to be detonated elsewhere in the northern hemisphere in attacks on overseas U.S. bases and in retaliation against the aggressor homeland.

Some of the subcommittee's conclusions were as follows:

"Probably the most significant finding presented to the subcommittee was that civil defense preparedness could reduce the casualties of the assumed attack on the United States from approximately 30 percent of the population to about 3 percent.

"The provision of shielding against radiation effects would at the same time protect against blast and thermal effects for the vast majority of the population.

"The cost of providing high-performance shelter protection for 200 million people was estimated at between $5 billion and $20 billion.

"The main conclusion presented to the subcommittee was that the country must have a national radiological defense system if the Nation is to withstand and recover from an attack of the scale which is possible in an all-out nuclear war."

We all hope to avoid a nuclear war, of course, but we have been less successful in some past years in avoiding a congressional war on another subject: The development of atomic power.

For the past 2 or 3 years before 1959 this had become an annual slugfest.

We used to debate, warmly and with some feeling, the issues of public versus private power, the rate of atomic power development, comparison with other countries, the role of government and industry, the advantages of different reactor types, and so forth.

However, this year, primarily because of the excellent relationships between the new AEC Chairman, John McCone, and our distinguished chairman, Senator CLINT ANDERSON of New Mexico, the Joint Committee and the Commission, after hearings, were able to reach agreement on a balanced atomic power development program for this fiscal year 1960.

This year the AEC authorization bill was approved unanimously by the committee, after a number of amendments to which the Commission consented.

The bill was then passed by both the House and Senate in the exact form recommended by the Joint Committee.

I hope that this spirit of harmony and cooperation will continue, and that we can find means for the Government and industry to work together to develop commercial atomic power.

The Joint Committee also held hearings in April of 1959 on the subject of atomic energy patents, and I know that this is a subject of considerable interest to your committee.

The AEC recommended, and the committee and the Congress approved, after our hearings, a 5-year extension of the so-called compulsory licensing provisions of the Atomic Energy Act.

The Commission testified while the industry is still in its infancy, the "reserve power" of the compulsory licensing section should continue to be available.

The compulsory licensing provision has never been invoked since enactment in 1954.

We wrote in many limitations and restrictions on its use, and it is truly a "reserve power" which I doubt will ever be used.

Our hearings disclosed, I am glad to say, that the number of applications and patents by private inventors is steadily increasing.

In 1947 AEC filed 282 patent applications, and others 110.

Ten years later, by 1957, AEC filed 260 patent applications, and 715 patent applications were filed by others, mostly private industry.

The other patent amendments requested by the AEC are still pending before the committee and will be considered further next year.

One of the most interesting problems is in the international field.

It presents the question whether AEC contractors should receive preferential patent rights abroad on research and development financed by the Commission.

I am not a lawyer—and I can assure you that this subject is very complicated.

But we will continue to try to follow policies of encouraging inventions and development by private industry, and at the same time making any technology developed by AEC financing available to all of industry generally.

Now for the crystal ball.

What will be the activities of the Joint Committee in 1960?

First of all, we normally begin each year with hearings on the development, growth, and state of the atomic energy industry, under section 202 of the Atomic Energy Act.

That section provides for annual hearings by the committee during the first 60 days of the session, with testimony from representatives of industry, labor, science, and the public.

I hope that some of the industry leaders in this audience will take advantage of this opportunity to make known to the committee your views, either by written statement or by oral testimony.

The "202" hearings are scheduled for February 1960.

Also on the docket for next year will probably be further discussions of radiation standards and allocation of responsibility between the AEC, Public Health Service, and other agencies in formulating standards of protection.

In the past, the National Committee on Radiation Protection and Measurement has recommended standards which have been adopted with only minor changes by the AEC.

In 1959 the President established by Executive order a Federal Radiation Council to review these standards and to advise the President as to policies in the radiation field.

Our committee, in the Federal-State bill which I mentioned earlier, established by statute the Federal Radiation Council, adding the Secretary of Labor as a member, and providing that the council should receive the best possible technical advice.

This year I am sure we will be concerned with the operations of the council and the Federal agencies in developing new radiation policies and standards.

These will, of course, be very important to the atomic energy industry, as well as to labor groups and the public.

We can also look forward next year to a review of the atomic power program.

I believe that the Federal Government should devote its efforts primarily to research and development, and that private industry should concentrate on construction of reactors.

The building of atomic power stations is a very complicated and expensive business.

It requires dollars for bricks and mortar and standard generating equipment which industry should provide.

But new atomic power stations also require heavy research and development expenditures, as Mr. Fairman can testify.

The Commission can, and should, stand ready to bear some of the research and development expenses, in order to accelerate our atomic power program.

Government construction of some small prototypes of new reactor types will probably also be necessary.

New reactor types are being developed, and further refinements and advances are being made in some of our older reactor types, such as the pressurized water and the boiling water reactors.

The committee will review the entire atomic power program thoroughly again next year, probably in connection with AEC authorization bill, since Government assistance in this program requires annual congressional authorization.

I think we can look forward to an interesting year, but it is still too early to predict what reactor types, if any, the committee will add to the Commission's recommended program.

Finally, it is likely that the committee will make an overall review of our international atoms-for-peace program next year.

Many of our friends abroad are fascinated with the atom, and there are many ways that we can work with them to mutual advantage.

Many of them are naive and do not realize the technical, financial, and legal problems involved, but all of them are anxious to work closely with the United States, and to improve their atomic know-how.

But how do our 48 bilateral agreements, our cooperation with Euratom, and our participation in the International Atomic Energy Agency all tie together?

What were the original objectives of each type of program?

What has been accomplished?

Should we redefine our objectives in our international atoms-for-peace programs?

These are all interesting questions which grow out of the past, but also have real significance for all future policies.

So you can see that we have not been idle in 1959, and that we have a very interesting agenda to look forward to in 1960.

The atom was developed during wartime and under conditions of secrecy, but is now finding more and more peaceful uses, with increasing possibilities for bettering the future of mankind.

I hope that this association will keep up its good work, and will make known its views to our committee during the forthcoming year, so that our committee can carry out its responsibilities in formulating policy, both with respect to the military and the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

A Possible Solution of the Farm Program

OF
HON. JACKSON E. BETTS
OF OHIO
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, one of the most highly publicized issues facing this session of Congress is the ever present farm problem. Constant reference is made to the mounting surplus of grain and the tremendous cost to the taxpayers of the subsidies involved. Since none of the past or present programs have solved the problem, I have introduced a bill which I hope will be given consideration as a possible solution. Briefly it provides for living off the surplus rather than increasing it. It applies only to wheat, is purely voluntary, and would replace the present cash subsidies. Any farmer desiring to enter the program would agree to take out of wheat production a number of acres equal to the average number of acres planted to wheat by the producer for 1958, 1959, and 1960. In return he would receive a certificate entitling him to 50 percent of his average annual production of wheat during the years 1958, 1959, and 1960. He could accept the wheat, or he could endorse the certificate and deliver it to the Commodity Credit Corporation. The endorsement would authorize the Corporation to sell the wheat to which he is entitled at the market price and remit the proceeds to the farmer.

I have limited the provisions of the bill to wheat and for a period of 2 years, simply as an experiment to see if it works. It has a twofold purpose of reducing the surplus and relieving the taxpayers of the present burdensome subsidy. I have discussed it with some farmers in the district I represent and they believe it has some merit.

It is not intended to be the perfect answer or a cure-all. However, it has the virtue of being new and different and I hope it may serve as a contribution to the solution of the farm problem.

Raising the Philippine Quota in the Next Revision of the Sugar Act

OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the 1956 amendments of the Sugar Act the Philippines alone received no increase in quota. It is hoped that in the present Congress when consideration is given to a further extension of the act more equitable provision for the Philippine sugar producers will be made.

Indeed such action in behalf of the Philippines has been promised. When the President signed the law in 1956 extending the Sugar Act for 4 years, he expressly indicated that when new amendments were being prepared at the conclusion of the present act, consideration should be given to increasing the Philippine share of U.S. sugar consumption. A press release to this effect was issued on May 29, 1956, which I take the liberty of quoting in full:

MAY 29, 1956.

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

I have today approved H.R. 7030, to amend and extend the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended, and for other purposes.

In addition to extending the Sugar Act for 4 years, the bill restores to the domestic areas the right to supply 55 percent of this country's increased requirements of sugar. The amendments also permit foreign countries to supply as much as they have been, plus 45 percent of the increases in our requirements. These increases will be most important relatively for the countries that heretofore have been minor suppliers.

It was not considered feasible to recommend an increase in the Philippine quota at this time. I believe, therefore, that when new amendments are being prepared at the conclusion of the present act, consideration should be given to allowing the Philippines to share in increased consumption, as is now provided for other foreign countries by this bill.

H.R. 9378—Requiring a Fair Return on Veterans' Life Insurance Trust Funds

OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of the session I introduced H.R. 9378. This bill was introduced to make changes in the procedure for investing the national service life insurance trust fund and the U.S. Government life insurance trust fund.

The national service life insurance trust fund exceeds $5,625,000,000 and this fund is invested in special issues of the Treasury, with 5-year maturity periods, bearing 3 percent interest. The U.S. Government life insurance trust fund exceeds $1,120,000,000. This fund is invested in special issues of the Treasury, with 1-year maturity, and bearing interest rates of 3.5 percent. It is the responsibility of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury to supervise investment of these funds. In my opinion, these officials have failed to discharge their obligation and are investing the veterans' life insurance trust funds at interest rates below the current market.

The investment policies of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury have been reasonably satisfactory until recently, but the administration's hard-money policy has changed the situation. As a result of calculated policies of the administration, interest rates have risen steadily for the past few years. During 1959 the Treasury issued obligations for sale to the public throughout the year with maturities varying from 1 year to 21 years at interest rates varying from 3¼ percent to 5 percent. On June 30, 1959, $1,111,000,000 of the U.S. Government life insurance trust fund was invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1-year certificates at 3½ percent. On the same date, $2,689,000,000 of the national service life insurance trust fund was invested in 5-year certificates at 3 percent. About this same time the Treasury was offering securities to the public for sale at considerably higher interest rates. In May 1959, issues with 1-year maturity and interest rate of 4 percent were offered. In July 1959 the Treasury offered securities to the public with 4-year 10-month maturity at 4¾ percent. In October an issue with a 4-year 10-month maturity was offered at 5 percent.

Despite the fact that the interest rates have been rising steadily, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury have shown no disposition to secure for the veterans' trust funds interest yields commensurate with the current market. Despite the lack of initiative demonstrated by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the administration to secure for veteran policyholders a fair return on their trust funds, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the administration have been very aggressive in urging legislation to lift interest-rate ceilings on home loans for veterans. During the last session of Congress, when the Committee on Veterans' Affairs was considering legislation to raise interest rates on veterans' home loans, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs insisted that the interest-rate ceiling on veterans' home loans be lifted because, according to the Administrator, such action "was urgently needed to insure an active and fully effective loan guaranty program. In other words, the administration has been keenly aware of the rising interest rates and has shown no hesitation in demanding high interest rates in instances where the veteran pays; however, the administration has shown a marked lack of interest in securing better interest returns where the veteran is on the receiving end.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I must observe that this situation is not confined to veterans' programs. Comparatively speaking, the veterans' life insurance trust funds have faired better than some of the other similar trust funds. On November 30, 1959, the civil service retirement fund had $8,813,974,000 invested in special issues of the Treasury at an average interest rate of 2.58 percent; the Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund had $15,891,845,000 invested in special issues of the Treasury at an average interest rate of 2.56 percent; and the Railroad Retirement Fund had invested $3,428,174,000 at an average interest rate of 3 percent. In my opinion, there is cause for concern about the low interest yields being paid to these funds. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the administration has shown a great determination in its program to lift the 4¼-percent ceiling on Government bonds, while on the other hand shows a considerable apathy for this side of the interest-rate picture.

It appears the administration is perfectly happy to see the bankers and private investment institutions of America receive high interest returns on their investments, but have little interest in securing equitable treatment for the trust funds which back up our social security program, Federal civil service retirement program, the veterans' life insurance program, and other similar retirement plans, which affect millions of ordinary Americans.

We all know that from time to time there has been considerable concern expressed for the actuarial soundness of the civil service retirement fund and the Federal old-age and survivors insurance fund. From time to time the administration has taken a negative position on proposed changes to these programs on the basis the changes would endanger the actuarial soundness of the funds. One of the best ways to improve the actuarial soundness of these funds, or any trust fund for that matter, is to see they are properly invested at the highest yield available.

As I pointed out, the Treasury is paying 3½ percent on the U.S. Government life insurance trust fund and 3 percent on the national service life insurance trust fund. At the same time, the Veterans' Administration is loaning money to veteran policyholders at 4 percent. This practice demonstrates the unfairness of the Administration's policy. In other words, if a veteran borrows his own money back from the Veterans' Administration, using his life insurance policy as security, he must pay 4 percent, yet the Secretary of the Treasury has the use of the bulk of these funds at a 3-percent interest rate.

Mr. Speaker, these trust funds which I have been describing are in the nature of captive funds. In the case of the veterans' insurance trust funds, these matters are left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no need for a change in legislation to insure the veterans' life insurance trust funds receiving fair treatment. Legislation has become necessary because the Administrator of Veterans Affairs and the Secretary of the Treasury have failed to act. It is for this reason I have introduced H.R. 9378. I have notified the Veterans' Administration and the Treasury I expect to begin hearings on this legislation on February 2.

OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS OF TENNESSEE
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, the last session of Congress, the 85th, and the 1st session of this Congress, the 86th, have been labeled by partisans and propagandists as "reckless spenders" by those who would seek political gain by this misrepresentation. As we begin this new session and again undertake the serious and demanding undertaking of appropriating necessary and adequate fund needs to assure the continued progress of our Nation, I think it is appropriate that we review the actions of the Congress on budgetary matters in the past and in particular during the last 6 years.

Mr. Speaker, first let us look at how our national spending has increased through the years as our country has grown and as we have faced grave crises both internally and nationally.

For almost three decades, preceding the turn of the century, the budgetary appropriations by the Congress were at a $300 million level. Then in 1891, the 51st Congress appropriated for the first time funds totaling more than half a billion dollars. The Federal budget remained at approximately this level until 1398 when it reached almost $900 million.

The 60th Congress in 1908 was the first Congress to break the $1 billion mark and I am sure that there were those in 1908 who labeled the Members of that Congress "reckless spenders."

Financing World War I made it necessary for the 64th Congress, 2d session, to appropriate the largest percentagewise jump from one year to the next that the Nation has ever known when the total budget jumped from $1.6 billion for the year preceding to $18.8 billions for fiscal 1918.

As the country grew internally and as World War II approached the budgetary appropriations continued to grow until the 2d session of the 77th Congress—in the midst of World War II—appropriated the largest sum ever appropriated when the budget figure stood at $147 billions for fiscal 1943.

After the war spending was reduced sharply and hit a postwar low in 1946 when the 2d session of the 79th Congress appropriated $35.7 billions.

Mr. Speaker, now let us look at what has happened to the budget during the last 6 years—since the Eisenhower administration has been in office. The budget estimates and requests for fiscal 1955 was $60.77 billion. The Congress cut and reduced this by some $2.6 billion and appropriated $58.16 billion. Again for fiscal 1956 the Congress cut the President's budget by more than $2 billion as his estimates totaled $66 billion and the actual appropriations totaled only $63.9 billion.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the Congress has consistently cut the President's requests for appropriations and has made substantial reductions each and every year. The largest cut was made by the 85th Congress when more than $5 billion was slashed by the Congress from the President's request for $78.1 billion of appropriations. That year $73 billion was actually appropriated by the Congress.

Last year alone $1,881,410,083 was cut from the President's budget. Thus, the Congress during the last 6 years has cut the President's appropriations requests by approximately $12½ billion. These are the true facts.

Mr. Speaker, let me repeat, the Congress during the last 6 years has cut and reduced the administration's request for appropriations by approximately $12½ billion. This vividly demonstrates and should make it clear to all that the Congress is not the heavy wild spender that the partisans, both in and out of Congress, the President and the propagandists would lead the country to believe. The misrepresentation that has been made in this area has been made, I repeat, for political gain.

The true facts are, the President over the past 7 years has repeatedly asked for larger and larger appropriations, for bigger and bigger spending. The Congress has exercised its collective judgments on these big spending programs and consistently cut and reduced them as the record indicates.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues, the press, and the public generally a concise and accurate report—Senate Document No. 67, 86th Congress, 1st session—relating to "Congressional Action on the President's Requests for Appropriations and New Obligational Authority"—a statement by the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON, majority leader of the Senate.

In this connection, Senator JOHNSON comments that the Congress has consistently made cuts in the President's budget, and regarding the so-called backdoor financing. The report points out that the President has either advocated bills approving new obligational authority before the Congress acted or else they were approved by him after the Congress acted.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from this report be reproduced in the RECORD following my remarks hereon. The report and appropriation tables follow:

COMPLEXITY OF FEDERAL BUDGET

The Federal budget and budgetary procedures are very complex and difficult to discuss or explain in simple fashion. It is easy to see why this is so, from the simple fact that the budget document for fiscal year 1960, submitted to the Congress at the beginning of the session, was the size of a metropolitan telephone book, weighing over 5 pounds and containing over 1,000 pages—most of which consisted of detailed statistical and fiscal tables.

Even this document presented only a portion of the facts. The congressional committees dealing with the various programs involved in the budget held hundreds of hearings—and printed tens of thousands of pages of testimony—in an effort to get at all the facts and have a basis for sound legislative action.

Apart from the problems arising from the very size and scope of the Federal budget, there is a very real problem in talking simply and intelligibly about the budget because of the many technical details involved. For example, no money can be placed under contract (obligated) or spent unless the program has first been authorized by the Congress. In some cases this authorization is in a separate law, which must be followed by a specific appropriation act. In other cases, the authorization is contained in an appropriation act. In still other cases, the authorization act itself provides the contracting and spending authority. Finally, there are some cases, such as interest on the debt, where permanent authority exists and whatever amounts are needed become automatically available each year, without any action by the Congress.

AUTHORIZATIONS VERSUS APPROPRIATIONS

If this sounds complex and confusing, the actual budgetary procedures are even more tangled than indicated by the above description. For example, there is no requirement that the amounts authorized to be appropriated in an authorization act be matched by actual appropriations. The fact is that many billions of dollars have been authorized which have not been appropriated. Consider these examples:

1. Rivers and harbors and flood control: Between fiscal years 1936 and 1959, projects totaling $17,811,405,000 were authorized for rivers and harbors and flood control projects. Actual appropriations, however, totaled $9,987,622,000. This means that appropriations have not been provided for authorized projects involving $7,823,783,000.

2. Reclamation: Since fiscal year 1902, authorization has been enacted for projects involving $7,906,092,000 Actual appropriations, however, total $3,509,869,000, leaving an unfinanced balance of $4,396,283,000.

3. Military construction: During the past 8 years, authorizations have been enacted for military construction projects involving $13,021 million. Appropriations have totaled $11,784 million for this same period, or $1,237 million below the amounts authorized.

4. Mutual security (foreign aid): During the past 8 years, a total of $34,005 million has been authorized to be appropriated for the mutual security program. Actual appropriations, however, have amounted to $29,229 million, or $4,776 million below the amounts authorized.

In these four areas alone, actual appropriations have been $18¼ billion less than the amounts authorized. Despite this clear evidence that authorizations are not the same as appropriations, a good deal of misguided information has been released to the public in which authorizations and appropriations are lumped together as if they were one and the same thing.

DISTORTION OF CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON BUDGET

Because of the complexity of governmental budgeting, it is easy to understand why people who are not expert in this difficult field can make honest mistakes in interpreting the facts. Getting the true story, however, is made even more difficult when the facts and figures are manipulated or distorted to prove a political slogan. This is what has happened in the incredible campaign to convince the American people that the Congress is a collection of irresponsible spenders and that only the executive branch stands like Horatius at the bridge to stem the onrush of the congressional spenders.

CONGRESS DOES NOT PRESCRIBE EXPENDITURES

Despite impressions to the contrary, the Congress does not prescribe the amount to be spent in any given fiscal year. Instead, the Congress provides spending authority, a large part of which remains available indefinitely until it is spent. In carrying out the various programs authorized by the Congress, the executive branch has exercised considerable latitude in determining both the rate and manner of using this spending authority. This extends from outright refusal to use funds provided by the Congress for specific purposes—as in the case of a large part of the $1.3 billion increase in defense appropriations last year—to the other extreme of spending at a deficiency rate.

In addition to this latitude, there are certain important areas of spending over which the Congress exercises no direct control. Thus, the executive branch has just announced that spending for interest on the debt during the current fiscal year will be $1 billion greater than had been estimated in January 1959. The Congress found out about this only when it was announced to the general public.

In truth, it is impossible for anyone to dissect the amounts spent in any fiscal year and determine with any degree of accuracy exactly how much the total spending has been increased or decreased by actions of the Congress or of the executive branch. This would be as accurate—and as rewarding—as unscrambling an omelet. Yet some people persist in trying to do this, apparently assuming that few people would realize the degree to which any such estimates are really slanted guestimates.

CONGRESSIONAL CUTS IN BUDGET REQUESTS

This does not mean that there is no way of determining accurately what the Congress has done in acting on the President's budget. What the Congress has done in acting on the President's requests for spending authority is a matter of public record and can be documented beyond question. This should be well known to those who prefer—for reasons of their own—to present a distorted picture of what the Congress has done. Perhaps this is the reason why such persons persist in proving their misconception with figures attained by scrambling together appropriations, authorizations, expenditures, backdoor finances, failure to enact tax proposals, and other ill-assorted and unrelated fiscal concepts.

Just what are the facts concerning action by the Congress on the President's requests for appropriations and other spending authority? The facts concerning the last session are summarized in two tables printed on the last page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. All the figures in these tables have been compiled by, or verified by, the Bureau of the Budget.

1. The Congress cut the President's requests for appropriations by a whopping $1,881,410,093.

2. The Congress cut the President's requests for new obligational authority contained in bills other than appropriations bills (this has been politically referred to as backdoor financing) by $699 million.

3. Thus, the Congress cut a total of $2,580,410,093 from the President's requests for new spending authority.

BACKDOOR FINANCING

Perhaps a few additional words should be said about the so-called backdoor financing. No one knows exactly who coined this phrase but it succeeds in giving the impression that there is something wrong with providing spending authority outside of an appropriation bill. This just is not so. Regardless of whether spending authority is provided by an appropriation bill or by an authorization bill, the same congressional and Presidential action is required to enact the spending authority into law. The only real difference is that the preliminary work is handled by a different set of committees before the bill in question is acted upon.

Perhaps those who imply that there is something sinister in the so-called backdoor financing are unaware of these significant facts:

1. During the 6½ years of the Eisenhower administration, the President has requested the Congress to enact 24 separate bills involving backdoor financing of $20,029 million.

2. The Congress has enacted 38 bills involving new authority of $25,726 million.

3. The President has approved 36 of these bills, involving new authority of $25,289 million.

In short, of the more than $25 billion of new authority that has been enacted into law outside of appropriation bills during the present administration, every cent was either advocated by the President before the Congress acted, or else approved by him after the Congress had acted.

CONGRESS HAS CONSISTENTLY CUT PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

The cut of more than $2½ billion in the President's requests for new spending authority clearly demonstrates that it is a sheer fabrication to describe the 86th Congress as a group of reckless spenders. Because of the widespread circulation given to this charge, however, some people may wonder whether the record of the last session was a "fluke" and think that the Congress normally votes for increased spending.

The fact is that the Congress has consistently cut the President's requests for appropriations each and every year. In addition to the $1,881,410,093 cut from the President's budget in the past session, the Congress cut over $10,600 million from the appropriation estimates in the preceding years. Thus, the Congress has cut the President's appropriation requests by approximately $12½ billion during the last 6 years.

Congressional reductions in the President's appropriation requests

Congress and session	Budget estimates	Appropriations	Decreased by Congress
83d Cong., 2d sess.	$60, 770, 315, 686	$58, 160, 445, 563	$2, 609, 870, 123

The NATO Parliamentarians Conference

OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH OF MISSISSIPPI

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, during the week of November 15–21, the Fifth Conference of NATO Parliamentarians was held in Washington, with the general assemblies held in the caucus room of the Old House Office Building and committee meetings in various committee rooms.

Members of the 14 visiting delegations told me that they thoroughly enjoyed the visit to Washington, which was appropriately held here in the 10th anniversary year of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Much of the credit for the successful meeting, together with the arrangements for extending the hospitality of the U.S. Congress to our visiting colleagues, should go to Representative WAYNE L. HAYS, chairman of the House delegation to the conference, and the U.S. member of the NATO Parliamentarians Standing Committee. Mr. HAYS served 1 year as president of the Conference and is presently a Vice President. His work with the NATO Parliamentarians Conference has brought great credit to the United States and to the U.S. Congress among our allies in NATO.

The Parliamentarians meeting here was very successful from the standpoint of discussion of some of the critical problems which face the NATO alliance. The Military Committee, for example, recommended in a resolution approved by the entire Conference immediate action to improve the air-defense system in Western Europe. The gravity of this problem has been made clear in the Council of Ministers meeting and in the conferences in which the President participated last month.

It is now conceded by all concerned that if NATO is to fully meet the challenge to strengthen Western unity, there must be far greater cooperation in political, economic, and cultural fields among the members of the alliance. I think the NATO Parliamentarians Conference should receive a major share of the credit for the impetus given this idea since the Parliamentarians meetings began. Most of the practical proposals for more fully coordinated activity in these broad fields were originally given responsible support in the NATO Parliamentarians Conference.

Challenges and Problems Facing the United States in the Sixties

OF
HON. JOSEPH W. BARR
OF INDIANA

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. BARR. Mr. Speaker, in the past few days I have been attempting to define some of the issues facing the United States in the next decade—the sixties. Frankly, I am not certain what the answers will or should be. But certainly the first step is to define the problem.

Representing the 11th Congressional District of Indiana is not easy. We have one of the largest, richest, and most intelligent districts in the country. I have found that one very helpful way to represent this great district and to work through a problem is to ask for advice from my own people in Marion County, Indiana.

Listed below are two challenges and 10 problems that concern me. I am inserting this statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the hope that my voters will study it and then give me their advice on these issues.

CHALLENGES AND PROBLEMS FACING THE UNITED STATES IN THE SIXTIES

DOMESTIC

I believe that our domestic challenge is roughly this: "Can we establish an economic climate that will provide job opportunities and a chance for every worker to earn his fair share of his productive contribution to this Nation?"

Under the challenge I see these specific problems:

First. What can we do about an agricultural policy that is clearly a failure from the standpoint of the farmer, the taxpayer, and the consumer?

Second. What can we do to encourage the savings that must finance the approaching technical and population explosion? (Both demand exorbitant amounts of new capital.) A stable population and a technology that is not changing require very little savings or capital.

Third. What should we, or can we, do to soften the blows of industrial strife—management-labor conflicts?

Fourth. Is our tax structure just and equitable? Does it provide a reliable source of national revenue? Does it dampen out, or does it exaggerate the swing of the business cycle?

Fifth. Can we afford to react to foreign competition by crawling back into a high-tariff box?

Sixth. Are we getting our money's worth from the $45 billion a year defense expenditure? Is interservice rivalry getting out of hand and hampering our defense efforts?

INTERNATIONAL

In my opinion the international challenge is basically, "How can we achieve peace in the world without surrendering our rights and our dignity as free men?"

The problems underlying the challenge seem to be:

First. Can the United States encourage the NATO nations to shoulder a more realistic share of the military burden?

Second. Can we shift to the World Bank, the Monetary Fund, the Inter-American Bank, and the International Development Association the burden of assisting the underdeveloped nations of the world attain a measure of economic sufficiency?

Third. Can this Nation somehow get its agricultural surpluses out of expensive storage and to the starving peoples of the world?

Fourth. In spite of a shortage of exportable dollars can this Nation step up its assistance in technical, agricultural, and medical counseling to the underprivileged peoples of the Middle East, Africa, and Asia?

CONCLUSION

These are the areas of policy that concern me. I know that there are probably other problems in which my constituents are also interested. Their opinion on these and other issues will be welcome!

The Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs

OF
HON. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD
OF MICHIGAN

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an organization which is performing a very valuable service to our Nation. I am speaking of the Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, founded 51 years ago this year. This organization has expanded to include 170,000 members of more than 3,400 clubs who are dedicated to community service, to helping those who are in need, and to improve the working conditions and opportunities in the business world for womankind.

In my own home State of Michigan, the federation has conducted numerous research projects which have proved of great value to some of our Nation's leading universities and to research agencies of our Federal Government.

The efforts of the federation in my own congressional district of Oakland County, Mich., have been outstanding. Many civic projects would never have come to pass if it had not been for the dedication, the hard work and the ability of the members of this group of business and professional women's clubs. In every worthy cause, these ladies are in the forefront.

It is well for all of us to pay tribute to the Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, to recognize the valuable contribution which these clubs and their respective members have made to our society, and to let them know that we appreciate their efforts.

A Bill To Increase Social Security Benefits, Improve Trust Fund Earnings

OF
HON. HENRY S. REUSS OF WISCONSIN

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, on the opening day of the 2d session of the 86th Congress, I introduced H.R. 9372, a bill making a number of important changes in the Social Security Act, including improving the earnings of the social security trust funds, and increasing social security benefits.

I am confident that the Congress will make social security improvements in 1960. I hope that the improvements will be comprehensive, rather than piecemeal, and will correct not just one but many of the shortcomings of the present law. I believe that H.R. 9372 fits that description.

Of vital importance is that provision of my bill which will increase the earnings of the social security trust funds, to permit payment of more realistic benefits and to insure soundness and fairness in the social security system.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 11, page 14390, I pointed out that the social security trust funds were being short changed by some 260 million a year, and introduced H.R. 8407, a bill to insure an adequate return on the social security trust funds by removing the Secretary of the Treasury as managing trustee of the social security trust funds, substituting for him a person without conflicting interests, and requiring a return on the trust funds as near as possible to the return being realized by regular investors in U.S. Government securities.

The situation which I described last July has not changed. I have therefore incorporated the provisions of H.R. 8407 in the new bill.

The Treasury is still depriving the social security trust funds of interest earnings amounting to about $260 million a year.

While private investors average more than 4 percent interest on Government securities, the Treasury Secretary, who manages the trust funds, has invested virtually all of the $20 billion in social security funds in Government securities earning only 2½ percent.

We can correct this situation by reconstituting the Board of Trustees of the social security funds and requiring the new board to take all needed steps, including proposing legislation if necessary, to bring the interest yield on the social security funds up to the level of earnings from Government securities of other investors.

In addition, H.R. 9372 will improve social security in the following ways:

First. A 10 percent across-the-board increase in old-age, survivors and disability insurance benefits, with a minimum increase of $5 a month.

Such an increase is needed to restore the dollar power which steady inflation has taken from our elderly citizens and others dependent on social security payments as their financial base.

Although Congress has several times raised benefits, they have never caught up to overall cost increases in our economy. A 10-percent increase will put social security payments back in a fair, realistic relationship to the cost of living in 1960 and, we can hope, long after that.

Second. An increase in future benefits by raising the earnings ceiling for contribution and benefit purposes from the present $4,800 to $6,000 a year.

No matter what a person earns in any year, only the first $4,800 of income is counted for social security purposes. This means that social security benefits are limited by that figure.

In 1939, the earnings limit was $3,000. That was fine then, because 97 percent of all workers covered by social security earned $3,000 or less. Today, however, more than 25 percent of covered workers earn more than the present earnings ceiling of $4,800. Unless that ceiling is raised, the future benefits of millions of retired workers will be considerably less than realistic in relation to the actual wages they had been earning. Raising the earnings ceiling to $6,000 will produce realistic future benefits for more than 90 percent of covered workers.

Third. Repeal the existing requirement that a disabled person must be at least 50 years old before he can qualify for disability insurance benefits.

As an army of experts has testified to congressional committees, there is absolutely no justification for denying disability benefits to persons under 50, who otherwise meet the requirements of the law. The younger disabled man needs help just as much, and sometimes more, than the older. For example, the disabled person of 35 or 40 is less likely to have children old enough to help support the family than is the man over 50. This arbitrary disability age should definitely be removed.

Fourth. Permit persons receiving benefits to earn up to $1,800 a year, instead of the present $1,200, from outside sources without a reduction in benefits.

Many older men and women are able and eager to work part time and feel they are contributing to society in a productive way. The present limit on outside earnings penalizes many such persons unduly. I believe that a modest increase, letting a person earn up to $150 a month without a cut in social security payments, is justified.

Fifth. Increase the maximum family benefit by removing the present arbitrary ceiling of $254 a month. The bill would increase the maximum family benefit to 80 percent of average earnings. This would mean a maximum of $320 a month under the present earnings ceiling—$4,800—and $400 a month under the proposed $6,000 ceiling. The existing $254 ceiling deprives large families of the full survivorship benefits to which they are entitled.

According to figures supplied by the Social Security Administration, the proposed additional benefits, offset by the increased earnings of the social security trust funds, would require an increase in the social security tax of only one-half of 1 percent in the employer's and employee's respective contributions.

Federal Aid for School Construction

OF
HON. EDITH GREEN
OF OREGON
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, today I have had the pleasure of introducing a bill to establish an emergency 2-year program for Federal aid to the States and localities for school construction. This bill, it is no secret, is a companion measure to the bill which has been reported to the other body by that body's Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The fight for Federal aid to education is an old one, Mr. Speaker. As in so many other legislative areas, the friends of the schools have marched up many a hill, only to fall a vote or two short of the summit. In assessing causes for the defeat of previous school legislation, I believe no single factor can be given greater weight than the constant and well-publicized willingness of the administration to give courageous and unstinting support to any school aid bill—any bill, that is, except the specific bill that happens to be before the House at any given moment. In past sessions, the House, having failed to pass a generous school aid bill sponsored by Democratic Members, has turned its efforts to inadequate bills offered by the administration. In most, if not all cases, the administration's ardor, even for its own "teeny-weeny" bills, suddenly cooled.

In this 2d session of the 86th Congress, in this closing year of the Eisenhower era, I hope the Congress will be able to enact some kind of legislation to assist our public elementary and high schools meet the desperate challenge which this age has thrust upon them.

There are those of us who believe that education is a sufficiently important and proper sphere of governmental activity to be federally supported in its own right. But there are many who will point, with some justice, to the titanic struggle for existence in which the free world is engaged, and suggest that all our energies should go into this struggle. In a sense I agree. All of our energies, developed to their highest degree, should go into the fight to maintain the future of freedom. I would differ completely with those sincere Members of this House who feel that only our military energies, or only our military and propaganda, or even only our military, propaganda, and scientific energies ought to be put into the balance against the challenge and the threat that is communism. I say that unless we develop our full intellectual armory, our weapons stockpiles will be useless. Unless we utilize our resources, including our financial resources, to help men learn ..hat it means to be free, what it means to be educated, what it means to be fully alive, then we have little left to defend. If our schools fail to meet the challenge which has been thrust upon them—and it is a different challenge than the challenge Soviet schools are meeting with success—unless they meet this challenge, then the free way of life is doomed. I believe this with all my heart. I hope and trust that my colleagues in the Congress agree. I trust that we will not let the "budget firsters" again frighten us away from our plain and inescapable duty to the future of the Nation.

In this context, I ask unanimous consent that a penetrating editorial recently printed in the Pendleton East Oregonian, be printed at the end of my remarks.

This editorial does not mince words or dodge issues. It points to the Federal control bugaboo as the phony issue it is. The editorial refutes this argument in telling and persuasive terms. It is a good text from which to begin this year's debate on Federal aid for education—the most important legislation before this Congress.

[From the Pendleton East-Oregonian, Dec. 8, 1959]

OF NATIONAL CONCERN

Whenever somebody tells us that Federal aid to education is as dangerous as the bubonic plague we suggest that he take a look at Hermiston High School, talk to teachers and administrators at Hermiston High School. That school received substantial Federal aid while McNary Dam was under construction and a lesser amount thereafter. There isn't a speck of evidence that anybody in Washington, D.C. has ever attempted to dictate to Hermiston High School.

The Oregon State Board of Education revealed this week that 31 of Oregon's 36 counties are getting Federal aid under the National Defense Education Act. In the current year, $711,000 will be spent in 133 Oregon school districts to improve teaching of science, mathematics, and foreign languages. The act also offers Federal aid to districts that want to improve their counseling service to students, and several districts are accepting that aid.

We doubt that any school district that is participating in the National Defense Education Act program has had any unpleasant experiences with it. We doubt that any has lost control of its educational processes.

Education is a matter of national concern. If a school district is doing less than an adequate job the entire Nation suffers. If a school district is doing an above-average job the entire Nation benefits. It is as important to you that a boy in Mississippi who has a high IQ is properly prepared to go to college as it is to his school district in Mississippi.

The fight against Federal aid to education is phony. The opponents place their emotions ahead of good sense.

Proposed New Veterans' Housing Program

OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a veterans' housing bill which I hope will revitalize the veterans' housing program.

The bill which I am introducing makes substantial changes in the veterans' housing program. These changes have become necessary since the veterans' housing program is becoming inoperative as a result of the administration's hard-money policy. Last year the Congress raised the interest rate on veterans' home loans from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent. This action did very little to improve the supply of mortgage financing for veterans' home loans. The rapid rise in interest rates resulting from the policies of the administration exceeded the increase in interest rates authorized by the Congress. Very little additional mortgage financing became available as a result of the interest rate increase. The situation has become progressively worse. High discounts are being charged throughout the country in connection with veterans' loans. These discounts range upward to 12 points and increase the interest yield to the lender to rates of 6 percent and above.

Interest rates have increased rapidly as a result of the administration's hard-money policy, and are now conflicting with the usury laws of the various States. Suits are now pending in local courts to determine whether the high interest rates being charged, together with large discounts, are a violation of State usury laws. This has resulted in many institutional lenders withdrawing from the mortgage financing field until the issue is settled. The administration has offered, as its only solution to the shortage of mortgage financing funds for veterans' home loans, increases in interest rates. It is apparent this is not the solution, since lending practices based on present high interest rates are now being questioned in the courts as violations of State lending laws.

In a recent survey by the committee, the loan guaranty officers of the Veterans' Administration in offices throughout the country have estimated that if the current tight money condition continues the Veterans' Administration will make only about 150,000 home loans in 1960. These same offices estimate that if mortgage financing were available, with moderate or no discounts, the veterans' home loan program would increase to 368,000 loans during 1960.

There is no prospect that there will be a change in the near future in the Administration's hard money policy and there appears to be little likelihood an increase in interest rates would produce the desired result. The bill which I have introduced makes several major changes in the housing program and seeks other sources for veterans' home loans.

This bill authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to issue debentures for sale with maturity varying from 10 to 30 years at an interest rate of not less than 4½ percent. These debentures will be offered for sale to the general public; however, they are designed to appeal to the major private trust funds of the Nation, such as union trust funds, welfare trust funds, private estate trust funds, and trust funds developed through the retirement programs of the various States and municipalities for public employees. The debentures to be issued by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs will be guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the U.S. Treasury. The funds obtained through the sale of debentures will be utilized by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for veterans' home loans.

The bill provides that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may loan these funds any place in the United States where a shortage of mortgage financing exists. The maximum loan is to be $17,500. Discretion is left with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs as to downpayment; however, 100 percent loans are permitted under the bill. The bill authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to charge the veteran borrower a 1-point fee at closing. Builders or sponsors who receive a commitment will be required to pay a 2-point fee for a fund commitment or fund reservation under the bill. These funds will be deposited by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in a revolving fund to protect the Government from loss. The bill provides that the Administrator may sell debentures at 4½ percent. The interest rate for the veteran's loan will remain the same as provided in the existing program—5¼ percent. The Administrator will have available the margin of three-quarters of 1 percent to offset his administrative costs in placing and servicing the loans.

The bill provides that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may sell not to exceed $5 billion in debentures in any one fiscal year. It provides that the Administrator may invest not to exceed 25 percent of the national service life insurance fund in the debentures. The bill extends the housing program for World War II veterans until February 1, 1965, so that the World War II program will be scheduled to expire on the same date with the program for Korean veterans.

This bill does not alter the guaranteed home loan program in any way. Private lenders may continue to participate in the veterans' guaranteed home loan program. It is intended that the program of home loans to be made by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs through funds obtained by selling debentures will supplement the guaranteed home loan program which is presently operating through private lenders for World War II and Korean veterans.

It is expected that early hearings will be scheduled on this legislation since the outlook for mortgage financing for veterans' home loans is very bleak for 1960 unless a solution can be found. The direct loan program, which has depended on appropriations directly from the Treasury, will not be continued past its scheduled expiration date of July 25, 1960. It is not expected that this program will be necessary if funds become available through sale of debentures.

OF

HON. NEAL SMITH

OF IOWA

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, senior Senator of Minnesota, was one of the principal speakers at the national convention of the Young Democratic Clubs of America in Toledo, Ohio, November 17 to 20, 1959. He addressed the convention on the subject of "Young and Old Fogeys." As chairman of the convention, I had an opportunity to witness the great enthusiasm with which his speech was received and given and so that those who were not among the 2,000 delegates at the convention may read his remarks, I under unanimous consent, include excerpts from his remarks in the RECORD:

YOUNG AND OLD FOGIES

(By Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota)

I take particular pleasure in addressing this national convention of Young Democrats, for as far as I'm concerned, what America needs most today is to regain its youth.

America is showing distressing signs of middle age.

And there's a very simple reason for it: The Republican administration in Washington today is made up of old men.

As a matter of fact, some of us have been thinking of rechristening the Cabinet the "Ten Old Men."

Now when I say "old" I don't necessarily mean old in years. I mean old in spirit. All of us know men who are old at 30—and we also know lots of men who are still young at 75.

A great former President we all love has more youth in him at 75 than this whole administration put together—yes, I mean our own special young Democrat, Harry S. Truman.

When I say that America and this Republican administration are showing signs of middle age, this is what I have in mind:

It's a sign of middle age when the obstacles loom larger than the challenge of overcoming them.

It's a sign of middle age when you can think only of reasons for not doing things, instead of discovering ways to do them.

But that, unhappily, is the spirit of '59 in Washington today. And when that is the spirit in Washington—in the White House, if you will—it spreads through the country like an epidemic.

I find it sad to think of America, the richest Nation in the world, making excuses to the world and to her own people that she can't afford to help other nations build their economies and can't afford to build proper schools for her children or proper houses for her slum dwellers.

Incidentally, you may have heard a lot of talk about the anti-intellectual atmosphere in Washington. But you shouldn't believe everything you hear. It's no longer considered subversive to have an idea in Washington—so long as it doesn't cost any money.

I am ashamed when I think of the millions of people throughout the world, barely staving off starvation, while America complains of the burden and cost of storing huge surpluses of wheat and corn and cotton.

I am embarrassed to think that America, the Nation that led the technological revolution, the Nation that produced the atomic bomb in a brief 5 years, has been surpassed not just once but many times by a nation that 40 years ago had no science, had no technology, and had virtually no industry.

What has happened to America? What has happened to our muscle? What has happened to our will to achieve, to create, to progress?

What has happened, I ask, to the America of the 1930's—an America beset with problems that make today's difficulties pale by comparison?

Today Washington worries about a balanced budget. Twenty-five years ago Washington worried about an entire national economy out of balance, about 10 to 13 million people without jobs, about dust bowls and breadlines.

That was a time that cried out for leadership—and the leadership was there in the person of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

That was a time that cried out for new ideas—answers to problems new and old. And the answers were found.

And why? Because there was a will to find them, a will to sweep aside obstacles and move on to get the job done.

Do you remember the CCC—the Civilian Conservation Corps? In the 1930's America needed the CCC and America got it, and thousands of young men went into our forests and parks and went to work conserving some of our greatest natural resources.

Well, America needs another CCC—and that's one of the things I have worked to get passed this year. But what does this Republican administration say to that? They say it costs too much. They say it will unbalance the budget.

Of course, this administration doesn't seem to mind giving billions to bankers by raising interest rates. That sort of spending it can afford. But it can't afford to spend a few million dollars to build human and natural resources through a Youth Conservation Corps.

The era of the 1930's, the era of the New Deal, was an era of youthfulness for America. We were challenged, and we rose to meet the challenge.

Today again we are challenged, but the youthfulness of our response is gone. This Republican administration is so beset by worries about bankrupting the country that it cannot even make the prudent investments that will add to the Nation's wealth. It is so beset by its concern over subversion at home—a leftover from the McCarthy days—that it throws a cloak of conformity over America and discourages new ideas.

The Republican Party has always been known as a party of old fogies.

But this, we are told, is the era of modern Republicanism. The Madison Avenue boys would like us to believe that the old guard is on the wane and that the young Turks are in the saddle.

Of course, all they're really saying is that the old fogies have been replaced by young fogies.

And there are some Republicans who are sounding these days more like Democrats than anything else. But let's not be taken in. It is still the party of the fogies, and if the GOP bosses pick someone who looks liberal, because they know it will take a liberal to win, they're not fooling anyone. You'll still have an administration of Republican fogies—the Republican Party will see to that.

My friends, we are not going to send rockets to the moon as long as we are led by a bunch of fogies—old or young.

And we're not going to close the science gap or the space gap or the missile gap with the Russians as long as we're led by fogies—young or old.

I have met with Mr. Khrushchev face to face, and I can tell you that whatever else he may be, he is young in spirit. No challenge is too great for him—whether it be the challenge of the free world or the challenge of his colleagues in the Kremlin for supremacy in the Soviet Union.

I shudder at the ruthlessness of the methods he uses to meet those challenges, and I do not propose for a moment that we imitate them.

I merely ask that we recognize that we are up against an adversary who is bound and determined to meet challenges and surmount obstacles and solve problems.

We can't meet Khrushchev's youthful spirit with America's middle age.

America had better begin thinking less about how we can't do this and can't afford that, and begin thinking more about how we can use our full powers and energy using the methods of free people, in the cause of freedom.

So I think America's hope lies in its young people. And I think the Democratic Party's hope lies in its young people, too—in every one of you young Democrats at this convention.

You know, a party can suffer from middle age, just as a nation can. And I sometimes wonder if our party hasn't lost some of the scrap and youthfulness that once characterized it.

Now I am not one to pick a fight solely for partisan advantage. No one gains from such a fight. The country suffers; our party suffers.

But I deeply believe that the Democratic Party has not only a right but a duty to draw issues. Our party is one of youth and controversy. Out of both we draw the vigor and the issues to go to the people and win elections.

Our job in the Democratic Party is to fight bad public policy wherever we see it, no matter how popular the man behind the policy; to fight for good public policy—for the people if you will—whenever we have a chance to do so; and to write a record, a Democratic record, that every voter in the country can recognize that has the stamp "Made by the Democratic Party" clearly written on it, for all to see.

For only on the basis of such a clear-cut record can we give the voters a clear-cut choice next year—a chance to express themselves so clearly that neither the next President of the United States, nor the 1961 Congress of the United States, can mistake the mandate.

U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Unemployment Visited Altoona, Pa., October 26, 1959

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of gathering firsthand information on the unemployment situation in the central Pennsylvania area a Senate Subcommittee on Unemployment, composed of Senator JOSEPH CLARK of Pennsylvania, as chairman, and Senator HUGH SCOTT of Pennsylvania, as a member, visited Altoona October 26, 1959, taking testimony from over a score of witnesses at both a morning and afternoon session held in Altoona's city hall. Those testifying represented a cross section of business, labor, and industry.

It was my privilege to not only make the following statement to the committee on the unemployment conditions in the three counties of my congressional district but I was accorded the privilege of sitting with the committee in listening to the testimony of other witnesses, many of whom shared my concern over the unemployment situation in my congressional district.

My statement follows:

Mr. Chairman, over a period of years it has been my privilege to appear before numerous congressional committees in support of area redevelopment legislation.

As a matter of fact, I am among a group of Representatives in Congress who are recognized as pioneers in this particular field.

My congressional district comprises the counties of Blair, Centre, and Clearfield, and has been plagued with chronic unemployment for years due to depressed conditions in the coal and railroad industries. At times as much as 18 percent of our total labor force has been unemployed.

Therefore, the residents of the 20th Congressional District know the meaning of ghost towns and the misery that follows in the wake of unemployment as we watch good American families being forced to exist on public assistance and surplus commodities.

Speaking of surplus commodities as of October 1 in my three-county area there are 36,758 persons eligible for surplus food or 12.6 percent of the overall population.

In fact, in Clearfield County nearly 20.1 percent of the population are recipients of surplus commodities and dependent upon them for the necessities of life.

Mr. Chairman, at the present time in the two labor forces in my congressional district, here is the picture.

As of October 1, 1959, in the Altoona area, out of a labor force of 53,700 there were 4,600 unemployed, or an average of 8.6 percent of the labor force; while in the Du Bois-Clearfield area, out of a labor force of 35,400 there were 5,300 unemployed, or an average of 15 percent of the labor force.

Therefore, the unemployment situation in my congressional district is simply this. Out of a labor force of nearly 90,000, there are 10,000 unemployed, or 9 percent of the labor force.

As I have said before, unemployment in my congressional district has been as high as 18 percent of the labor force. One point I want to emphasize is that unemployment conditions are not temporary or seasonal nor can we see any improvement in the coal and railroad industries.

As a matter of fact, employment in these industries is still on the downward trend and nobody dares to predict when employment will level off.

For an illustration my hometown of Altoona is principally a railroad town because it is the site of the largest railroad shops in the world operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. Early in 1951 these shops employed 14,361; while August 1958 employment dropped to 2,500.

According to information at hand employment is expected to level off at 7,000 as it was on October 1, 1959. This means that in the city of Altoona alone, there has been a loss of over 7,000 jobs.

Mr. Chairman, this situation in Altoona is duplicated in the city of Du Bois where hundreds have been furloughed by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

Instead of having around 1,200 employees, as of October 1, 161 were employed with the expectation that employment in Du Bois will level off at 600, which means that 50 percent of the B. & O. labor force will be jobless.

I have been pinpointing unemployment in the railroad industry in an effort to show the permanent loss of jobs. Similar facts reveal that the same condition exists in the coal, brick, and related industries in my congressional district.

One often hears the question: "Why is it that these areas of chronic unemployment cannot help themselves?"

The answer is that while some 1,800 communities throughout the country have active area redevelopment corporations, I can only speak for my own congressional district where such groups have been active for years and have enjoyed a measure of success.

For example, since 1946 in my hometown of Altoona, Pa., as a result of an active industrial redevelopment group that raised nearly a million dollars mostly through voluntary payroll deductions, 11 new industries have been brought into the Altoona area solely through community, State, and Federal effort.

These new industries have provided 3,600 new jobs and a $12 million increased annual payroll.

Seventy percent of the new jobs are for men.

This highly successful effort stems from what is commonly known nationally as the Altoona plan.

Mr. Chairman, in attaining this remarkable record the Altoona group like other groups in my congressional district has borrowed at the banks to the legal limit.

In addition, the Pennsylvania Industrial Development Authority, as well as the Small Business Administration, have assisted to their legal limit.

Therefore, in my congressional district these area redevelopment groups are in need of further financial assistance such as is provided for in the area redevelopment legislation now before Congress.

I think I can speak for all area redevelopment groups in my congressional district when I say that they do not want any Federal handout.

What they need primarily is additional borrowing power which coupled with other forms of Federal assistance as contained in the pending bills will enable them to assist in wiping out these pockets of unemployment and their human wastage.

In achieving this objective, we will not only rehabilitate our economy through diversification of industry, but we will, in effect, be barring a repetition of this chronic unemployment that we have been faced with for years.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to repeat a question constantly asked by many of my constituents—"Why is it that Congress sends billions of dollars to so-called underprivileged nations yet ignores the plight of good American citizens who through no fault of their own are unemployed?"

The answer to this question is that Congress too long has ignored "the pockets of unemployment" that have brought suffering and despair despite national prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for those who quibble and employ delaying tactics over the cost of area redevelopment legislation. Since we have billions to pour into foreign aid, we certainly have a moral obligation to care for the needs of America's unemployed.

The fact that area redevelopment legislation is fully justified makes it pertinent to ask, "Why solicit a repetition of last year's veto by having the pending Douglas-Flood bill given similar treatment since it resembles to a marked degree the Douglas-Spence bill of the 85th Congress?"

Frankly, it will not be difficult for me to support the Douglas-Flood bill, but I must confess the possibility of another veto is a cause for great concern.

While there is no one in the Senate or the House who would stoop to playing politics with the misery of unemployment, we cannot ignore the fact that unless a bill is enacted the suffering of the people in the depressed areas is not going to be alleviated.

Mr. Chairman, among the sponsors of depressed area legislation there exist two conflicting points of view.

To begin with, in principle the administration has endorsed aid to depressed areas.

In addition, the two great major political parties also endorsed the principle in their 1956 platforms.

Therefore, the question that Congress must resolve is the extent of aid to the depressed areas of the Nation.

In an effort to reach this common objective, it is imperative that reasonable people should be willing to compromise.

In this connection, it is my belief that the President will find it possible to accept a reasonable compromise between the administration bill and the Douglas-Flood version of the legislation.

In my plea for a reasonable compromise, it must be thoroughly understood that I am not presuming to speak for the administration, nor have I had any consultations with administration leaders on the subject.

Mr. Chairman, let us be practical and face the facts concerning depressed-area legislation. In the event of a Presidential veto of the Douglas-Flood bill, I have been unable to find anyone willing to flatly predict that the veto will be overriden by the House of Representatives.

The fear of being unable to override a veto is based on the fact that it requires two-thirds of the votes cast to accomplish that purpose.

Therefore, looking the facts right in the face, when you review the position of those Members of the House today in relation to their last year's vote on the Douglas-Spence bill, one finds that the margin of victory would be insufficient to override a possible Presidential veto of the Douglas-Flood bill.

Mr. Chairman, to improve the chances of enacting depressed-area legislation, I introduced H.R. 4878, a bill which represents a compromise between the administration's approach and the Douglas-Flood proposal.

With a few exceptions, my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, offers the same types of aid contained in the Douglas-Spence bill vetoed last year.

For example, instead of making every depressed area eligible for the same types of assistance, my bill provides different degrees of Federal assistance based upon the level of chronic unemployment and the need in such areas.

In this connection, it is my belief that areas which have suffered greater levels of unemployment should be entitled to a greater degree of aid than those communities whose problems of unemployment are of a lesser degree.

Briefly, my bill, H.R. 4878, provides for the following programs:

(1) Technical assistance: Depressed areas would be eligible for technical assistance to help the communities to appraise their physical and human resources, which would prepare them to plan constructive programs to attract new businesses and expand existing businesses in these areas.

(2) Community loans: Depressed communities would be eligible to receive loans from a revolving fund of $100 million.

We know that the conventional lending facilities in depressed areas are not as venturesome as those in growing and expanding communities.

The fund would put the depressed areas on a more equal footing with other communities in attracting new jobs.

(3) Public facilities: Some communities need improvement in public facilities before they would become sufficiently attractive to new businesses which might desire to locate in these areas.

My bill provides for an establishment of a $25 million revolving fund from which these communities would be able to borrow.

While the figure may appear modest, attention is called to the fact that legislation is pending before the House which would establish special funds for community facilities.

Meanwhile, under my bill, H.R. 4878, a smaller fund would be allocated and earmarked to aid depressed areas.

In addition, the most depressed communities which do not have the sufficient resources to borrow funds would be eligible to receive grants up to a maximum of $25 million.

At this point, let me stress that this is not an annual appropriation but is intended to be a $25 million revolving fund from which these communities would be able to borrow.

The administrator of the program would be expected to limit the grants only to communities with the greatest need for aid and which do not have sufficient resources to repay the loans in the foreseeable future.

It should be stressed that this is no giveaway program; under the provisions of my bill grants would be made only for projects which would provide lasting improvements and thus broaden the economic base of the communities.

(4) Vocational training and subsistence: One of the big problems of the people in depressed areas is the fact that many of their industries have declined or disappeared and, consequently, the demand for the skills acquired by the people in these areas has also diminished or vanished.

In order to enable these people whose skills have become obsolete to gain new employment, we must provide facilities to retrain them.

Therefore, it is urged that we enact the program contained in my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, as a realistic means of providing an effective program to aid the chronically depressed areas of the Nation.

Since the cost of depressed area legislation has proved a stumbling block in the past and impeded our efforts, let me point out that the cost of the Douglas-Flood bill is $389.5 million as compared to the cost of the administration bill which is $53 million.

By ways of contrast, my compromise bill, H.R. 4878, will cost $158 million or just about midway between the cost of the Douglas-Flood bill and the administration bill.

In connection with depressed area legislation, let me state that I have no pride of authorship.

My sole desire is to aid the people in the depressed areas and to attain such a laudable objective the spirit of compromise should be dominant in our minds.

As one who represents two chronically depressed areas in Pennsylvania with unemployment at times as high as 18 percent of our labor force and which has plagued us for years, my goal is that Congress enact without delay an effective bill in a form acceptable to the President, thereby eliminating the prospects of another Presidential veto.

Mr. Chairman, the residents of the 159 depressed areas of the Nation are entitled to this type of legislation, and it is my sincere hope that Congress will compromise any differences and enact a depressed area bill without further delay.

Extension of Rural Library Services Act

OF
HON. EDITH GREEN
OF OREGON
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I have today had the pleasure of introducing a bill to extend the Library Services Act of 1956 for a period of 5 years, and to make certain technical amendments which will not change the effect of the act, but which will, rather, simply take cognizance of the admission of the States of Alaska and Hawaii into the Union, and to leave in abeyance until the Congress has before it the results of the 1960 decennial census, certain policy decisions in regard to the communities covered by the act, as extended.

Let me briefly explain the purpose of my bill. The Library Services Act, as passed by this Congress in 1956, provided for a program of grants-in-aid to the States to stimulate and assist in the provision of Library services to the residents of rural communities. Under the original act, $7,500,000 per year was authorized to be appropriated, to be divided among the States wishing to participate on the basis of a formula recognizing the State's share of the rural population of the Nation as the major factor. The original act further provided that no community with a population of more than 10,000 would be eligible for assistance under the act.

Generally speaking, the first 4 years of this act's history have justified the high hopes those of us who originally sponsored it had for its effect upon the spread of library services to rural communities.

Forty-nine of the fifty States are now participating in this act, and these States have all increased their rural library services programs, not only to the degree made possible by the allocation of Federal funds, but out of their own resources, with the Federal funds serving largely as stimuli, and as a symbol of the national interest in this matter.

State activities in aiding public libraries have increased by 54 percent in the 4 years of the life of this act. Thirty million Americans living in rural communities now have library services available to them which were either not available at all, or not to the present degree, as a result of the working of the act. Sixty-five counties and an equal number of New England towns, which formerly had no library service, are now receiving such service. Two hundred new bookmobiles are in service under the Library Services Act. Two hundred and eighty separate projects were included in the State plans for 1959. Over 5 million books and other informational materials have been added to the library resources of rural communities.

This much has been done, Mr. Speaker, under the Library Services Act in its first 4 years of operation. But, it should be pointed out, this is only an indication of what could have been done, if the act had been allowed to operate at its fullest. The Congress has not been reluctant to appropriate funds for this program, but the Budget Bureau has seen fit, here, as in so many other areas, to pursue its standard policy of penny wisdom and dollar folly. In the 4 years of the act's history, a total of $30 million could have been appropriated, under the authorizing legislation. But in no one of those years was the full amount requested or appropriated. In fiscal 1957, $2,050,000 was appropriated; in fiscal 1958, $5 million; and in the last 2 fiscal years, $6 million each. As a result of action taken by the Congress, allocations to States were made on the basis of the full authorization in the last fiscal year, but the growing needs of our rural libraries might well have come much closer to fulfillment, had the full amount been available through the appropriation process each year. It is too soon to tell what funds will be available in the fiscal 1961 budget, which will be the last appropriation under the initial authorization. But so far, only 63 percent of the total funds authorized have actually been appropriated, and even if the full amount is requested and appropriated next year, nearly $11 million of authorized funds will have been denied this important and profitable program.

The amendments contained in the body of my bill, Mr. Speaker, are simple, and do not change the policy of the original act. The first subsection simply extend the life of the act for an additional 5 years. Subsections (b) and (c) make technical amendments reflecting the fact that Hawaii and Alaska have been admitted to the Union and are already subsumed under the term "State." The final subsection, in effect, freezes the present coverage of the act. Under the present act, no assistance can be extended to a community with a population of more than 10,000. The Department, in issuing its regulations has taken the 1950 decennial census as its guide. The extension bill retains the 1950 census as the guide for eligibility. In this way, the communities now being served will continue to be eligible; none will suddenly be excluded from the act by population growth reflected in the 1960 census.

Mr. Speaker, the Rural Library Services Act is not the most extensive or the most costly of the Federal grant-in-aid programs. But this program is surely one of the most rewarding, one of the most encouraging, and one of the most productive of the educational grant programs. The experience we have had in the first 4 years surely augurs well for what can be accomplished in the next half decade, as library doors swing open for more and more of our people.

Fate of Young Hungarian Freedom Fighters

OF
HON. ALVIN M. BENTLEY
OF MICHIGAN
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD the following exchange of correspondence with the White House regarding the fate of the young Hungarian freedom fighters facing execution by the Communist regime:

DECEMBER 9, 1959.

President DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
White House, Washington, D.C.:

I have been asked by certain Hungarian friends and constituents of mine to request your personal intervention with respect to the youthful Hungarian freedom fighters who are allegedly facing execution by the Communist regime of that country. I am aware that this subject is presently being debated by the General Assembly of the United Nations but feel that a personal statement expressing your horror at such a report might be helpful in marshaling world public opinion against this barbaric undertaking.

Respectfully yours,
ALVIN M. BENTLEY,
Member of Congress.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
WASHINGTON,
December 14, 1959.

Hon ALVIN M. BENTLEY,
Member of Congress,
Owosso, Mich.

DEAR AL: For the President this will acknowledge and thank you for your December 9 telegram respecting your plea in behalf of the 350 Hungarian freedom fighters.

While the State Department has no information at this time concerning this matter, you can be sure that we will continue to follow the situation in Hungary with close attention. In this connection you may wish to have the enclosed statements by Ambassador Lodge on the question of Hungary.

Kindest regards and best wishes for the holiday season.

Sincerely yours,
JACK Z. ANDERSON,
Administrative Assistant to the President.

STATEMENT BY HENRY CABOT LODGE, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE IN THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, ON NOVEMBER 25, 1959, ON THE QUESTION OF HUNGARY

Mr. President, the United States supports the recommendation by the General Committee that an item entitled "The Question of Hungary" be included on our agenda.

Last year in Resolution 1312 the General Assembly declared that the United Nations will continue to be seized of the situation in Hungary, in view of the fact that the Government of the U.S.S.R. and the present authorities in Hungary are disregarding earlier resolutions of the General Assembly. By the same resolution, the General Assembly appointed Sir Leslie Munro to represent it for the purpose of reporting on developments relating to the implementation of the Assembly resolutions on Hungary.

Sir Leslie Munro has now requested the General Assembly to consider the Hungarian situation. He reports that there has been no improvement of conditions in Hungary and calls attention to the refusal of the Hungarian authorities to cooperate with the United Nations in any way in this matter. In these circumstances, the United States also requested inscription of this item. I may say in our opinion the request of the Representative of the U.N. on Hungary would have been enough.

Nothing we know today leads us to believe that the States concerned have ceased their defiance of resolutions which were adopted by overwhelming majorities at previous sessions. As recently noted by the United Nations Representative on Hungary, foreign armed forces remain in Hungary and the framework of repression remains unchanged. In the shadow of continued trials and executions of Hungarians whose only crime was their barehanded fight for independence against Soviet tanks in 1956, and in the shadow of the continuing reports of impending executions, it is clear that the end of the reign of terror is not yet in sight. It seems clear to the U.S. delegation, therefore, that we must inscribe this item and that we must consider the Report of the United Nations Representative on Hungary.

As I explained in my statement in the General Committee on November 23, we regret the circumstances that gave rise to the necessity for inscribing this item. Recent events encouraged us to hope that there might be real relaxation of international tensions and improved international cooperation, which are, of course, the goals for which this very international organization was established. We still hold to that hope, Mr. President, but we must set down that to attempt to sweep crimes like these under the rug will not cause these hopes to be fulfilled and will not promote peace. We accordingly urge members to join in supporting the inscription of this vital question.

STATEMENT BY HENRY CABOT LODGE, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE, IN THE GENERAL COMMITTEE ON THE QUESTION OF HUNGARY, NOVEMBER 23, 1959

Mr. Chairman, before we adjourn this meeting there are certain fallacies which have been expressed here which I should like briefly to rectify. I took some notes during Mr. Kuznetsov's speech, and I noted some of these phrases: "Dirty work," "sordid assignment," "mouthpiece for slander," "puppet," "slanderous assertions and concoctions" in my letter.

Now, I am not fortunate enough to be familiar with the Russian language, and maybe these are ordinary, routine phrases in Russian. But I have some familiarity with English and with French, and I can say that in those two languages these are extremely violent words. If Mr. Kuznetsov is really interested in lessening the cold war, he could very easily prove that fact by using parliamentary language in a parliamentary assembly. I say that to him in as bland a tone as I can use.

Then he also referred in his speech to the conversations between Chairman Khrushchev and President Eisenhower which were held at Camp David and which in a press release the other day the Soviet delegation characterized as the spirit of Camp David.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we prize—we in the United States—prize what was achieved at Camp David, and none are more opposed than we to doing anything which would destroy it.

One way to live up to that spirit is to conform with United Nations resolutions.

I feel that perhaps I have some right to talk about Camp David for the simple reason that I was there. In fact I was present at all the meetings which took place. These meetings were adequately summed up in the communique which is well known and I can assert that there is nothing in that communique or in what happened at Camp David to justify the declaration that the very modest action on Hungry which we are discussing today is against the spirit of Camp David.

What is against the spirit of Camp David Mr. Chairman, is the subversion of small countries.

What is against the spirit of Camp David are acts which turn a brave little country into a moaning colonialist slum.

What is against the spirit of Camp David is any behavior which makes a veritable mockery of peaceful coexistence.

Mr. Chairman, nothing happened at Camp David which requires us to condone evil.

Nothing happened at Camp David which requires us to pass by in silence on the other side of the street when a brutality is being committed.

Nothing happened at Camp David to prevent us from acting like human beings made in the image of God when cruelty is being practiced.

The spirit of Camp David was not intended to be a soporific to peoples in the democracies to put them to sleep in the belief that this dangerous world—which we all hope may some day be safe—has actually been made safe.

No one looks more eagerly than I do for the day when the United States and the Soviet Union can work regularly together for the peace of the world. This is an end devoutly to be wished and I shall always work for it.

But we work against such a day when we distort the spirit of Camp David into something which was never meant at all and which no one present thought that it meant.

I realize that there may be colleagues of mine here in this room who think that in speaking as I am now doing I am striking a false note. But I do not agree.

We can only build a peaceful world on truth—and the spirit of Camp David never told us to close our eyes to the truth.

We can only build a peaceful world on deeds—deeds of justice—and the spirit of Camp David never told us not to do such deeds.

Instead of criticizing this proposal, why don't you do something to show that you really believe in the true spirit of Camp David? Why don't you take down the barbed wire and the observation towers which now divide the poor Hungarians from Austria and the free world and which have turned Hungary into a vast human cage? Why don't you chain up the savage dogs which roam along the border to catch the miserable human beings who are seeking freedom?

It is by deeds such as these that we can best live up to the spirit of Camp David.

Let me say in conclusion that the Camp David communique states "that all outstanding international questions should be settled not by the application of force but by peaceful means through negotiation." If, therefore, we are really to live up to the spirit of Camp David, Sir Leslie Munro ought to be admitted into Hungary, the United Nations resolutions adopted by overwhelming votes should be carried out in Hungary, and the Soviet Union, instead of working against the United Nations, should work with the United Nations. That would be really carrying out the spirit of Camp David.

The United States supports the request of the United Nations Representative on Hungary that an item of an important and urgent character entitled "The Question of Hungary" be inscribed in the agenda of the 14th General Assembly. The United States as a member of the General Committee has itself also requested the inscription of the item.

This request, Mr. President, was necessitated by the resolution on Hungary adopted by the 13th General Assembly and the continued defiance by the present Hungarian regime and the Soviet Union of the General Assembly resolutions on Hungary.

Resolution 1312 declared "that the United Nations will continue to be seized of the situation in Hungary in view of the fact that the Government of the U.S.S.R. and the present authorities in Hungary are disregarding the above-mentioned resolutions of the General Assembly." By the same resolution the General Assembly decided "to appoint Sir Leslie Munro to represent the United Nations for the purpose of reporting to member states or to the General Assembly on significant developments relating to the implementation of the Assembly's resolutions on Hungary."

On July 9, 1959, the United Nations Representative on Hungary in a public statement revealed that his patient and quiet efforts to gain admission to Hungary in order to obtain firsthand information concerning the implementation of the Assembly's resolutions had been rebuffed by Soviet and Hungarian authorities. Sir Leslie Munro announced his intention of submitting a full report on his activities to the 14th General Assembly.

In the explanatory memorandum attached to his request for inscription, the United Nations Representative on Hungary has stated that foreign armed forces remain in Hungary and that the framework of repression remains unchanged. In spite of public assurances of the representative of the present Hungarian regime that reprisals against Hungarian patriots who fought in the 1956 uprising have ceased, the explanatory memorandum records the harsh fact that trials and executions of Hungarian freedom fighters have taken place since the last General Assembly. Apparently, the end of the reign of terror is not yet in sight, for there are disturbing rumors that more executions are pending.

The United States supports the initiative of the United Nations Representative on Hungary. We deplore the circumstances that gave rise to the necessity for this important and urgent request. All members should hear what Sir Leslie Munro has to report and consider appropriate further steps to achieve the objectives of the United Nations.

Transportation Tax

OF

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, the State of Montana, as well as many other Western States, depend to a very great extent on the airlines, the railroads, and the bus companies to provide fast and dependable transportation between our cities which are separated by great distances. For more than 15 years our citizens have been taxed every time they used these vitally necessary common carrier facilities. At present this transportation tax is 10 percent but by virtue of the passage of Public Law 86–75 in the last session of Congress, beginning July 1, 1960, this tax will be reduced to 5 percent.

I was very pleased with this progress but I sincerely feel that during this session we must abolish the remaining 5 percent. What was the original purpose of this tax? Certainly the raising of wartime revenue was one consideration, but the primary purpose was to discourage nonessential travel during the emergency thereby freeing our facilities for military and defense use.

I feel that it is self-evident that this purpose no longer exists. On the contrary, one of the paramount objectives of our national transportation policy is to foster and encourage travel to strengthen our transportation companies.

Only by increased passenger patronage can the airlines carry out the massive jet conversion that is presently under way and for which over $2¼ billion of capital investment is committed. The Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board has urged the repeal of this tax on the ground that it deters travel and depresses airline revenue.

Similarly, the Interstate Commerce Commission has urged repeal because "the tax on passenger travel tends to discourage the public from using common carriers, it thereby aggravates the ever-mounting passenger deficit."—ICC Docket No. 31954, page 70. We all know the plight of the railroad passenger operation and we all know that the only real answer is more passenger revenue.

The bus situation is no different. The number of inter-city busline companies declined from 2,858 in 1950 to 1,700 in 1957; revenue passengers declined from 815 million to 516 million; and busline employees declined from 66,570 to 52,900 during the same period.—Bureau of Census, Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1958, page 571.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that continuation of a 5 percent excise tax designed to discourage travel is against the national interest and extremely unwise. As the ICC stated in the Railroad Passenger Train Deficit Case:

> In strongly urging that the Congress take action to repeal the tax outright, we are not unaware of the efforts which various members of the Congress have made and are presently making in this regard. We are also not unmindful of the revenue needs of the Government. We are, however, convinced that any possible loss of revenue would be more than offset by the public interest in strengthening and preserving a transportation system capable of meeting adequately the country's need for service both in peacetime and during emergencies in conformity with the national transportation policy as declared by the Congress. (p. 70).

I realize that any proposed legislation which would eliminate a source of Federal revenue should be subjected to close scrutiny. However, I am convinced that repeal of the remaining 5 percent tax will not result in any substantial net loss of revenue.

It is widely recognized that the some $110 million gross that the fact that a high proportion of common carriage travel is business in nature and the amount of transportation tax paid is taken as a corporate income tax deduction.

In addition, an offset would result if the tax were removed by virtue of increased taxable income resulting from increased travel once the deterrent tax is removed.

In the airline industry the Federal government pays some $60 million in subsidy per year to make up operating losses of local service and helicopter companies. Yet this tax discourages passengers from traveling on these carriers.

In short, Mr. Speaker, it appears that on the merits no one can justify this tax and everyone agrees it is harmful and outdated. The only question is whether we should sacrifice a revenue source. But even on this score it appears clear that the net yield is not substantial and would probably be more than offset by increased corporate income taxes and by subsidy savings.

The Full Potential of Educational Television Must Be Realized Without Prejudiced Obstruction

OF
HON. HAROLD R. COLLIER
OF ILLINOIS
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, during the adjournment months of Congress several members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted an extensive field study on educational television and its present and future place in our American system of education. This study was done in western, middle-western and southern States and covered all phases of educational work now being done through the facilities of television on both an in-school and home study basis.

One of the principal benefits cited in favor of educational television and its expanded use is the opportunity offered to equalize educational opportunities between areas with scattered populations, limited financial resources and inadequate or smaller schools with the better resources of other larger and better equipped schools. A second major argument for the expansion of educational television is one which must be given conscientious and unbiased evaluation, namely its wider use of superior teaching skills in the sciences and foreign languages. Subjects such as Spanish, Russian, German, chemistry, biology, physics, an mathematics may now be included in school curriculums through the use of educational television by expert teachers who become a part of the daily schooling in several classrooms at the same time. The number of students who seek instruction in highly technical subjects, like advanced mathematics, physics and chemistry, is constantly increasing, thus opening the door to a greater use of superior teaching skills through the medium which can be made available in practically every village and hamlet across the country.

As in any other field where established and conventional methods are employed, a wider and more effectual use of educational television is likely to encounter initial opposition in some quarters because of the normal tendency to resist changes from that which is customary. Progressive educators in some areas have moved forward with enthusiasm in this field. One very interesting presentation which I heard personally during the field study came from Mr. Joseph Hall, superintendent of the Dade County Public Schools, who pointed to an actual savings of $3 million in capital outlay in classrooms. Most interesting in his testimony was the following statement:

> By using the large groups (300–400 students) involved in the television program and the extended school day, we are able to accommodate 30 percent more pupils in a building than we can otherwise handle. It works in this manner: Approximately one-third of the pupils report to school at 7:30 a.m., another one-third at 8:30, and another one-third at 9:30 a.m. They leave school at 2:15, 3:15, and 4:15 p.m. This means that for four periods during the middle of the day, the entire group of students is present in the building. In this period, by utilizing our school auditoriums for the large groups, we are able to accommodate a much greater number of pupils within the same facility. With the program we now have involving only a limited number of our schools, we feel that we have saved at least $3 million in capital construction. To provide for the number of pupils in the established pattern for education that we now have in our buildings would require an immediate capital outlay program of at least $3 million. We believe as we involve other schools that the amount of capital savings will be increased far beyond this point.

Mr. Speaker, during the course of hearings in which I participated, I had an opportunity to go into several classrooms during the televising of a variety of in-school programs. In a biology class, for example, we watched youngsters intently observing the disecting of small animal life which had been magnified to a greater degree than would ever be possible under a normal microscope. We saw fourth- and fifth-grade youngsters who had learned Spanish through daily in-school television instruction carry on classroom conversations fluently in that language. We spoke to both grade school and high school youngsters in schools to get their reaction to the value of learning through this medium. We saw the specialized teaching personnel of the stations which work in the ETV studios. We studied with them their financial problems and the potentiality of expansion.

The work of the committee and the statements of a parade of witnesses was far too vast and detailed to permit a complete presentation at this time. It will, of course, be available to every Member of Congress when the subcommittee report is issued in the near future.

However, there is one conclusion that must be recognized. In-school educational television has a tremendous potential. It is now and can become an effective tool for better education, particularly in specialized fields. Every obstacle of prejudice must be removed so that its full potential, its advantages and its disadvantages, can be fully realized.

Address by Hon. John W. McCormack, of Massachusetts, Before the AFL-CIO Legislative Conference

OF
HON. JOHN H. DENT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 11, 1960

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, this House of Representatives has been blessed by having many good and great Members.

The mark of a great public servant is the ability to be able not alone to think and act in the public interest but even more so to be able to so express himself that little doubt is left as to his position on any public subject or under any given circumstance.

Recently I was privileged to be in attendance at a meeting where the great bulk of American labor was represented.

Many speakers graced the speakers' list and all of them were capable, able, and articulate. However, it remained for a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives to make the greatest contribution in oratory, in facts, in logic, and finally in sound common sense.

I speak of our esteemed, able, and forthright majority floor leader, the Honorable JOHN MCCORMACK, Democrat, of Massachusetts.

His speech is so full of the kind of advice and information so badly needed in today's confused atmosphere of politics, labor, and the people's problems that, under the unanimous consent of the House, I include it in the RECORD in order that all the Members can have the same privilege granted to all of us who heard Mr. MCCORMACK deliver it at the conference held at the Willard Hotel, this city, January 11, 1960:

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN MCCORMACK, DEMOCRAT, OF MASSACHUSETTS, BEFORE THE AFL–CIO LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE, WILLARD HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 11, 1960

President Meany, my fellow Americans and outstanding leaders of labor from the various sections of the country, ladies and gentlemen and friends. I have a great admiration for Congressman FORD and he and I are personal friends, so that any remarks that I make, of course, have no direct application to him, particularly on the level of friendships. I just want to make a few observations before making some brief remarks about his speech of admonitions to labor and his very fine general platitudes about rededicating ourselves—everyone here is a dedicated American—and also about the Modern Republican philosophy of government. If any exists, I fail to see it.

I do not feel strange in this gathering because I come from a working district and a working family. I think the philosophy of government and practical operations that you entertain and I entertain are the same. I think an examination of my voting record would show that fact. My voting record is the result of my own thoughts and considerations about our Government in practical operation. For years, I stood shoulder to shoulder with the late Franklin D. Roosevelt agreeing with him and his philosophy of government and also a great former President Harry S. Truman.

Broadly speaking my philosophy of government is to strengthen the family life of America. I think that's the dedicated duty of a legislator and I did that as a member of the Massachusetts Legislature and in my 31 years as a Member of Congress. The very strength of any government or any society is based upon these little units called the family life. Your family, my family, the other person's family, and the strength or weakness of a government is dependent upon the strength or weakness of family life, those little units that collectively make up the very broad foundations of any government and in our case of American government and American society.

I can go back to when I first came here, when 5 cents an hour was paid to human beings in wages in certain sections of the country. I can go back to the dramatic fight of minimum wage, when we tried to get a minimum of 25 cents through and it was riddled to pieces on the floor of the House under the leadership of Mary Norton, great legislator, great girl, recently passed away. It was riddled so badly, we voted to send it back to committee, rather than pass it. Then a couply of months later we got another bill out and finally got it through, struggling to get something on the statute books that represented progress. I can remember social security; I was one of those who drafted it. I remember all those fights. In many of these fights—damaging amendments, that's where the damage is done. The thing to watch in Congress are the amendments that are offered. And the motion to recommit with an amendment which, if adopted, would destroy, practically destroy the bill and let only a title go through.

My philosophy of government in practical operation is that government functions for the weak. The strong don't need it. That doesn't mean we destroy the strong, but we lift up the weak. And the weak is a broad class. It isn't only those out of a job. It might be the small and independent businessman, if he is discriminated against by too many contracts being given by the Defense Department, for example, to a certain large group of companies. It might be the failure to pass an adequate small business administration act.

The philosophy of the government of Roosevelt and Truman was to look forward, to recognize that government is not a status quo institution, because when government becomes status quo it begins to decay and disintegrate. With all regard to my dear friend, the record of the Democratic Party shows that we're the party of the people. I can't say that for every member of the Democratic Party—I wish I could—but I can say it for the great majority of the Democratic Party. We are the party of the people and the party of progress.

The record of the years that have gone by clearly show that fact. Minimum wages, starting at 25 cents, now a dollar; and when President Eisenhower recommended the last increase to 90 cents, we made it a dollar. I am confident we can get another increase through this session, if there's teamwork all around.

My dear friend talks about the national economic growth. I agree with him. I remember, not too many years ago, when Harry Truman said the goal is a $500 billion national economy and my Republican friends laughed and stomped him. It is now up to $485 billion. And if we didn't have the tight-money policy carried on to the extent that it is, the high-interest policy, the tight-money policy, our national economy today would be $550 billion, in my opinion.

My dear friend didn't talk about business. I don't know many businessmen who vote Democratic. They have a right to vote Republican, but when my friend admonished, particularly labor in Michigan, for supporting the Democratic Party, I didn't hear my dear friend make any references to the big businessmen throughout the country who vote Republican. They have a right to do so as individuals. Nevertheless, whatever is goose for the gander is also goose for someone else.

I think you are more interested in knowing—coming down to 1960—about this session of Congress. Knowing some of the things that might happen, some of the things I'd like to see happen and without proper assistance might not happen. Now the Republican Party has its responsibility. The Republican Party owes an obligation to the people to act constructively, to constructively oppose, constructively propose, and constructively criticize. That's the role of a minority party under the constitutional role of the Government, not to be a blind party of opposition. Each individual Republican is elected by the people of the district they represent, Republicans, Democrats, and independents in the Congress, and they have their individual responsibility to vote and not hide behind the cloak that this is a Democratic Congress. Whenever they pass over their responsibility, they are simply adopting the roles of a party of blind opposition, not the role properly that should be adopted by a minority party, not under parliamentary government, not under constitutional government such as we enjoy.

The most important question confronting us is the survival of America. What good is a constitution, what good is anything, if we have Communists in control of our country? We have got to have an America not only for ourselves but for the generations to come, the youngsters who are walking the streets now. Their fate is involved in what is being decided today. Not only you and I of today, but the generations to come, that of young Americans, their fates and their lives. The kind of life they are going to lead—your children, your children's children—is being decided today and history is being made while you and I are sitting here. The first thing we've got to do is to preserve America; to be sure we maintain this government of laws of ours and it doesn't turn into a government of men. That depends upon human leadership, wisdom, sagacity, ability, foresight, vision, courage.

So far as I am concerned, if I'm going to err in judgment, in the world of today, I'd rather err on the side of strength and on the side of wisdom. And I'd have felt happy if the President, in his message of a few days ago, had recommended more taxes for greater national defense. I think that would have appealed to the American people to make sacrifices and certainly it would have been the wisest thing to do, because America is second best in the world today. We are certainly second best, particularly in the field of outer space.

One of the things we can bring up this session—one of the things we should bring up is civil rights. The Democratic leadership is determined to bring up a bill this year. The President recommended it strongly in his message. In all our hopes and plans for a better world, we all recognize that provincial and racial prejudice must be combated as it goes along. He says "I hope there will be among the matters to be seriously considered in the current session—civil rights legislation."

While I am talking on civil rights legislation, let me make this observation which cannot be contradicted. The first civil rights bill that ever passed Congress since the Civil War, close to 90 years, was passed by the 85th Congress, a Democratically controlled Congress. We had a split in our party. You know it; I know it. But it put it through just the same with the Democratically controlled Congress. Yet only 4 years before in the 83d Congress, controlled by the Republican Party, both in the House and the Senate with President Eisenhower in the White House, complete control of our Government, not divided control, complete control, the Republican Party did not even report a civil rights bill out of committee in the House and the Senate.

So we have the fact that the 86th Democratically controlled Congress put the first bill through, even with a division. The Republican Party, 4 years before, with their promises contrasting with their performances, failed even to report a bill out of committee.

Civil rights is now out of the House Committee on the Judiciary before the Rules Committee. You and I know the practical situation. There are eight Democrats and four Republicans, four Democrats from the North and four Democrats from the South; there are Republicans from the North. The Republican Party is a sectional party. If we get three Republican votes in the Rules Committee and they ought to give them to us, we can get that rule or resolution out of the Rules Committee. And if that resolution comes out of the Rules Committee, Speaker RAYBURN and I will bring it up immediately thereafter for consideration by the House of Representatives. The Republican Party has their responsibility, we have ours. If they don't give us those three votes, we will have to resort to a discharge petition.

Only this morning JOHN BYRNE, who is the chairman of the Republican policy committee, said he was confident there would be civil rights legislation this session, but he held there was no reason to rush special tactics. The old delay. What they want is to try to have the Senate act on the bill. I know what they want. They know if the Senate acts first on the bill, the Democratic leadership has more difficulty in bringing that bill out under Senate rules than if the House passes the bill. If the House passes the bill first, the Democrats, under the rules of the Senate, have much more freedom in calling it up for consideration of the Senate than if they are forced to take the Senate bill.

Another important bill we expect to get up this year is an increase in the minimum wage and an extension of its coverage. We'll get it out of committee, but again when it goes to the Rules Committee, we need seven votes. On that bill, the Democratic leadership does not ask the Republicans to give us three votes. All we ask is that they give us one Republican vote on the Rules Committee. On that we have six Democratic votes. We are sure of six Democratic votes. Another bill is the depressed area bill. That bill has passed the Senate. We brought it out of the House committee. It's now before the Rules Committee and all we ask our Republican friends who have a responsibility, is to give us one vote, just one vote in the Rules Committee. That's all we want.

Another housing bill is to be reported out. You remember the housing episode of the last session. The President vetoed the bill we put up to him. It wasn't as broad as I would like, but we didn't want to put something before him that would be vetoed. Then nothing would go through. So we tried to consider the thing practically. But the President vetoed the bill, so we put another bill up to him which he signed. It was identically the same as the first bill he vetoed with one exception. We deleted $50 million in loans for classroom facilities in colleges and universities of our country. We put that in there so that they could borrow money from the Government at reasonable rates of interest in connection with the scientific field in particular in connection with this great race in science that is going on now between our country and the Soviet Union.

We are going to have a housing bill and all we need is one vote from the Republican members of the Rules Committee. That housing bill will include urban rehabilitation and community facilities. We are going to bring up a school construction bill. We will try to improve the social security law. But we need one vote—one Republican vote—in the Rules Committee. We've got six Democratic votes. I can state that with confidence. All we ask JERRY, again, is one vote—one Republican vote on the Rules Committee.

Water pollution, important to many parts of our country, purifying the streams and rivers of our country, not only connected with business but with the health of our people, the bill has passed the House, passed the Senate, come back to the House to go to conference, objected to in the last session. We have to go the Rules Committee to get a rule out to take to the Speaker's desk to send to conference. We have six Democratic votes and all I ask of our Republican Party is to assume their responsibility to the people. Show their good faith by performance, not by promise, and give us one Republican vote on the Rules Committee.

We are going to increase the money for a revolving fund for small business administration. Well, I think we might get one or two votes, Republican votes, in the Rules Committee on that. Another bill is the unemployment compensation standardization bill. We are going to try to get it out of committee. We need your help. We would like to get 2 Republican votes in the Ways and Means Committee out of 10.

Is that asking too much? Are there not two of them that feel that they represent the people? Are there not two of them that come from laboring districts? Or districts where the people are essentially workers? We need two votes—Republican votes in the Ways and Means Committee. We could have gotten it out last session if we had gotten two Republican votes. Again when the bill comes out we are going to do everything we can, but we need your help. We need the teamwork we have a right to. We would like to get two Republican votes in the Ways and Means Committee, and when it comes to the Rules Committee all we ask is that they give us one Republican vote. Is that asking too much? You, the people, that's the minimum they should give us.

There is going to be health legislation, extending the Hill-Burton Hospital Act. Additional hospitals are a crying need of our country. The Hill-Burton Act has done immeasurable good and should be broadened. Furthermore, we are going to try to increase the appropriations—and in this I say JERRY fought shoulder to shoulder for the increases—increase the appropriations for medical research in the field of medical research.

Last year, we increased the President's budget, I think about $75 million. We have as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations one whom I consider one of the greatest Americans I've ever met, one of the greatest legislators I've ever met, one of the finest gentlemen I've ever met, and thank God we have him there. I refer to JOHN FOGARTY of Rhode Island.

JOHN FOGARTY's name will go down in history as a man who has done more to contribute toward increased appropriations for further medical research, beneficial to the health of our people here and people abroad, unfortunate human beings who are sick, holding out to them the hope of the future. He has made a greater contribution than any Member of Congress that I have ever served with. JOHN FOGARTY'S name, in my opinion, will go down in the legislative history of our country as making one of the greatest contributions in this field than any legislator in the entire history of our country.

Now, I want to make another observation, on the broad scale. I'm alarmed, my friends, at the complacency and the apathy that exists among our people. It reminds me of the days before Pearl Harbor under Hitler. When you talked about Hitler then, they thought you were a warmonger. Now if you talk about communism, some people look at you blankly. I'm capable of interpreting the thoughts of people from my years of experience. Oh, they give me a polite hearing when I talk about communism. I'm not talking about labor, I'm talking about the people generally, they listen to me with attention but I cannot get across an idea to the great majority of those I'm addressing. They're living in a dream world of hope. That was the world we lived in before Pearl Harbor. When we tried to put a bill through to extend the selective service 3 months before Pearl Harbor, it passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 203 to 202. Every Member who voted against that bill was just as good an American as John McCormack who voted for it, who led the fight for it.

I wouldn't want to see another day like that come in the history of my country where the margin was so close on a bill that it might involve the very preservation of our country. Complacency and apathy existed widespread, you know that as well as I do, in the days of Hitler before Pearl Harbor. We find in America today the same spirit. Complacency and apathy, dangerous because that's construed by the dictator as weakness and fear just as Hitler did. When they allowed him to get away with the Ruhr they said they hoped he would be satisfied. He wasn't. Then he moved into Sudetenland. Oh, he will be satisfied, we hoped so. He wasn't. Then he moved into Austria. They said they'd let him get away with it, they hoped he would be satisfied with it. He wasn't. Then he moved into Czechoslovakia. They let him get away with it. Then Munich, and after that, the raping and the invasion of Poland. I hope we don't take that journey again.

Throughout the country there is today that complacency and apathy, and it's growing. Right at our back door we find communism attacking us in the Caribbean. If you think there's nothing to that, you'd better awaken. The situation is very acute there. I was one who opposed Khrushchev addressing a joint meeting of Congress, and I think that's one of the finest things I did during my 31 years as a Member of the Congress. I'm not afraid of him.

I say negotiate them and negotiate them. I've told the Assistant Secretary of State to keep on negotiating with him, but I didn't think Khrushchev should be permitted to travel the country, using the United States as a sounding board for the circulation of Communist propaganda throughout the world. I said it before the fact. I'm not saying that now after the fact, I said that before the fact.

We have to realize that the only thing that the Communists respect is what they fear. The one thing they fear is military power greater than they possess themselves. There's the record. You know the record of the Republican Party. There are some progressive members in it and I take off my hat to them. But the progressive element of the Republican Party is liquidated for political purposes. They have no influence. As a matter of fact, I think one of the contributing factors in Rockefeller's announcement—I said so last January—I said then he wouldn't let his name go into the convention because I knew the Old Guard was in control of the Republican Party though the great rank and file of the Republicans throughout the country in spirit supported the Old Guard. Last January I expressed the opinion because Rockefeller was too progressive, and would not be accepted. I think that's one of the main reasons that he made the decision he did because in his trips throughout the country, he couldn't separate the professionals in the party, the Old Guard from the people—the rank and file of the Republicans. He realized he was running up against a stone wall. You have the record of both parties. I'm not appealing to you to be Democrats. It's a matter of which party serves the American people the best. With all of our weaknesses, the great majority of the Democratic Party are representing the people. The great majority of the Republican Party represent the vested interest in big business. I'm not saying all of them do, it wouldn't be fair, but the great majority does. I see it on the floor of the House. You see it. We have the record of the past.

We are not going to confine ourselves to the program I have just stated to you. We need help, we need one Republican vote in the Rules Committee on most of these measures with the exception of civil rights, where we need three. We need a couple of Republican votes in the Ways and Means Committee on the unemployment compensation standardization bill. We need help from you, we need help from other interested Americans who are interested in progressive, visionary, forward-looking government. We also need help from the American people.

America is strong. If the day ever comes when the Soviet Union can hit us, and we lose our retaliatory power they'll not wait for us to catch up. We are already 3 to 5 years behind in outer space. We might be 5 to 7 years behind when they unfold what they plan in the Pacific.

We've got to preserve America—not as Democrats, not as Republicans, not as independents, but as Americans. We have much to do; we must work together and when we come on to the legislative level, the best interests of America calls for progressive government. The record of both parties shows that the Democratic Party is the party of progress.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Matthew 1: 37: For with God nothing shall be impossible.

Most merciful and gracious God, grant unto us more of inner strength and peace that we may meet the challenges of our day with untroubled hearts.

We penitently confess that we have failed Thee so often even when Thou hast given us a clear vision and command as to what Thou art calling us to be and do.

Show us how we may dispel the confusion and chaos of these perilous times in which mankind is groping.

Gird and empower us by Thy holy spirit that we may help to direct the wills of men in the ways of truth and righteousness.

Reveal unto us the wonder and glory of that eternal kingdom which Thou art seeking to establish upon this earth through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

SENATE RESOLUTION 219

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Richard M. Simpson, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

SENATE RESOLUTION 222

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Steven V. Carter, late a Representative from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

SENATE RESOLUTION 223

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Alvin R. Bush, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

SENATE RESOLUTION 224

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable Charles A. Boyle, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, adjourn until Wednesday next.

PANAMA CANAL: POTENTIAL VICTIM OF SUBVERSIVE FORCES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, for many months the people of the United States have watched with growing concern the rising Red tide in the Caribbean immediately to the south of us, which is now converging toward the Panama Canal and aimed at wresting its control from the United States.

Tomorrow, under a previous order of the House, our distinguished colleague from my own State of Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] will address this body on the most timely and gravely important subject of the Panama Canal as the key target of what now amounts to a fourth front.

As you know, he has made extensive studies of isthmian problems, especially those of diplomatic and juridical character. I am sure that his address will be highly informative, definitely constructive, and delivered in his usual brilliant form.

The tragic attempts of Panamanian mobs on November 3 and 28, 1959, to invade the Canal Zone, incidents that bear the stamp of the Red pattern, have made the Panama Canal a topic of worldwide interest, and a potential victim of subversive forces. Thus, it is of the utmost importance that the Congress, which is the ultimate authority for the determination of policies relative to the Panama Canal and interoceanic canals, generally should be fully informed on all the weighty problems connected therewith.

CIVIL RIGHTS PETITION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the President in his state of the Union message recommended that this House accept a civil rights bill.

The Speaker and the majority leader commendably have made statements to the effect that Members might well sign the discharge petition so that the House can work its will on this bill despite the intransigence of certain members of the Rules Committee.

I think Members on both sides of the aisle should come forward and be counted. The Nation is alert. The voters are watching. Failure to sign may be detrimental to some and fatal to others, if the bill cannot be considered by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore urge that Members sign this petition.

SAM HUFF: COAL ATHLETE OF THE YEAR

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, recently the National Coal Policy Conference honored one of West Virginia's favorite sons, Robert Lee "Sam" Huff, by naming him "coal's athlete of the year." The award presentation was made by Mr. Joseph E. Moody, conference president, in a ceremony at the small coal-mining community of Farmington, W. Va., which I have the honor to represent in the Congress.

I would like to call attention to this ceremony because it serves to dramatize one of the unique contributions made by the coal industry to the national scene, specifically, to the world of sports.

As sports fans everywhere know, Sam Huff is an outstanding defensive star for the New York Giants of the National Football League. As a college student, he was an all-American lineman at West Virginia University. By championship performance on the athletic field and by exemplary conduct in private life, this young West Virginian has become a source of pride to his State and to the coal community where he was born and raised.

But Sam Huff, whose father and brother are bituminous coal miners, is merely one of many championship competitors from the Nation's coal region's young men who have over the years excelled in athletics. It is said that our coal-producing areas produce, in addition to our No. 1 energy source, the finest athletes in the world. To support this statement, the National Coal Policy Conference has also drawn up a professional football team composed solely of players from coal regions.

This mythical "all-coal-all-pro" team includes 13 Pennsylvanians, 4 West Virginians, and 1 member each from Ohio and Illinois. In addition to Sam Huff, the team lists eight other champion performers from coal areas who will participate in the all-professional game at Los Angeles this weekend. They are Gino Marchetti, Smithers, W. Va.; Lou Groza, Martins Ferry, Ohio; Jesse Richardson, Scranton, Pa.; Stan Jones, Altoona, Pa.; Bill George, Waynesburg, Pa.; Walt Michaels, Swoyerville, Pa.; Jim Schrader, Carnegie, Pa.; and John Unitas, Pittsburgh, Pa.

And in addition to these athletes, the all-coal team includes 10 other outstanding players from coal areas, 2 of them, Bruce Bosley, from Green Bank, and Madison Nutter, from Huntington, coming out of my own State of West Virginia.

As a representative of a coal-mining area, I would like to venture an opinion as to why young men such as Sam Huff excel in their athletic endeavors. I believe that he, for one, has learned from the example of his coal-mining father the benefits of perseverance, a high degree of skill, devotion to duty, and pride in doing the best of all possible jobs. These are the essential characteristics of a champion athlete, and they are also the attributes of America's coal miners. To be sure, they are the very qualities which give life to the American system.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Sam Huff for this latest distinction and commend the National Coal Policy Conference for giving recognition to the fundamental human contribution which makes the American coal industry the greatest in the world.

DISCHARGE PETITION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. First I want to thank the majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], for his kindly consideration in giving us time to sign the petition to bring to the floor the bill on civil rights. I do not know just what that is.

Will the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary explain whether that bill, if it is enacted, will protect my seniority rights on the Republican side to appointment on committees; or does it fail to go that far?

Mr. CELLER. In general it protects the rights of everybody. I do not know if it goes as far as that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The rights of Congressmen—minority Members?

Mr. CELLER. The political and economic rights of everybody; and if the gentleman will offer an amendment to protect rights of seniority, I would not offer any objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman accept that amendment?

Mr. CELLER. I would accept the amendment.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Has the gentleman any idea whether his acceptance would be helpful to me?

Mr. CELLER. I do not know about that. If the gentleman will sign the petition and vote for the bill, I certainly would be willing to do that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have done many things that I have regretted; maybe I will, but I cannot promise.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. On the question the gentleman raised concerning seniority within his own party, whatever his party agrees upon in that regard, we Democrats will protect his civil rights.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. When they have kicked me around, the Speaker has protected me when he could. It is my understanding that as a rule he goes along with the recommendation of the leadership on my side.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman noticed what I said; whatever his party decides, we Democrats will protect his civil rights.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I heard the gentleman the first time. But cannot understand just why my civil rights should be denied by one or two ambitious Republicans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

THE LATE FRANK SMITH

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked when I picked up the Chicago Sun-Times of Monday to learn of the passing of Frank Smith, a noted war correspondent, one of the finest journalists Chicago ever produced and one of the sweetest personalities I have ever known.

He was 56, and his death from a heart ailment was sudden. I had been with him and Alvin Rose, onetime city editor of the Sun-Times, now head of the Public Housing Administration in Chicago, at the Chicago Press Vet's banquet in November, and he seemed in the pink of health. His unexpected passing is a keen personal blow to me, a great loss to the fourth estate, to which he was such a credit, to the city of Chicago, and to our country. My heartfelt sympathy goes to his widow and his children.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks and that any Members desiring to do so may extend their remarks on this subject at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, the passing of Frank Smith, wartime correspondent and reporter for the Chicago Sun-Times, was a shock to his many friends and admirers. He was loved by all who knew him. His work among the veteran organizations endeared him to thousands of servicemen.

He was a quiet, gentle, and polite person who was always ready to befriend the unfortunate. He disliked to write ill of anyone. Yet his reputation for truth in his news articles was a trademark. As a war correspondent he parachuted with the troops and wrote vividly of the action on the scene. He was a fearless and courageous individual. No war hero deserved greater acclaim.

We will miss his timely advice and sincere interest in our affairs. The political fraternity has suffered a great loss and the veterans a true friend. He was a great patriot and an honest American. To his dear family we send our heartfelt sympathy and condolences. In times of sadness we seek the solace of prayers. May God rest his soul.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply grieved to learn of the death of Frank Smith, and to his widow and children I extend my sympathy in their great loss. During the war Frank Smith's dispatches from the battlefronts were widely read in my district, and throughout Chicago, especially because of the many references in them to the GI's in the ranks. He was a fine man and had a host of friends.

Mr. MURPHY. I join with my colleagues in expression of grief and in tribute to the memory of Frank Smith. He was my friend for many years, going back to the time when he was a football star at Loyola and Northwestern. As a war correspondent he covered the foxholes, as well as the posts of high command, and his dispatches were always filled with personal items about GI's from our city whom he had mingled with on the battlefronts. In recent years he had covered the county building in Chicago. He was a great journalist and, above all, a fine lovable human being. My deep sympathy goes to his widow and children.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Illlinois, Congressman O'HARA.

The death of Frank Smith was indeed a great loss to the entire journalistic fraternity of America. In my 20 years as a writer and reporter in Chicago, seldom have I met a man who was more dedicated to the highest traditions of American journalism than Frank Smith.

Frank Smith was uncompromising in his determination to bring his readers a clear picture of the community in which they lived: its shortcomings and its attributes; its problems and the best formula for their solution.

He was a newspaperman's newspaperman—the sort of reporter that the entire profession respected.

I recall how before the war Frank Smith pioneered in the field of exposing deplorable conditions which existed in the Nation's mental institutions. The people of Chicago to this day remember his penetrating series entitled "Seven Days in a Madhouse," when Mr. Smith infiltrated the State hospital at Kankakee, Ill., and spent 7 days posing as an inmate to bring his readers the grim story of how inmates were treated and the archaic, inhuman methods that were being used at that time to treat the mentally ill. It was his devastating series that started the first reform movement in Illinois to improve the treatment of the mentally ill in State institutions.

During the war, Frank Smith was one of the great American war correspondents who insisted that in order to write about the great tragedies, privations, and hardships of armed conflict, a reporter must himself participate in that conflict. It is no surprise, then, that Frank Smith joined thousands of other young Americans in the first paratroop invasion of the Pacific. Although much older than the physically fit young men of the paratroop division, Frank Smith made the same jump in a parachute as the combat soldiers, and for this daring act, he had been singled out not only by the journalism profession, but also by military agencies throughout the world.

Mr. Smith had the unique facility for bringing home to thousands of Chicagoans a vivid picture of what their sons were enduring during the Pacific campaign. Upon his return to the Chicago Times after the war as veterans editor, Frank Smith's name became legion among tens of thousands of reading veterans who had marveled at his courage during the war.

In the most recent years, Frank Smith had been assigned to cover the county building in Chicago, and men in public office from both parties have always extolled Frank Smith's fair, honest, and objective reporting.

I worked with Mr. Smith for 20 years. I can personally testify to the fact that he has symbolized the very essence of American journalism. His deep devotion to honest and fair reporting has been an inspiration to reporters and writers who have joined the ranks of Chicago journalism during that period.

The Chicago Sun-Times, his longtime employer, has suffered an irreparable loss in the death of Frank Smith. To his wife and to his children, may I add my own deepest sympathy and express my sincere desire that he may rest in peace. Although not a soldier, Mr. Smith lived a soldier's life and deserves the same commendation as any of America's glorious heroes who died in the defense of our country. His weapon had been his pen and typewriter, and because of men like Frank Smith, we Americans today can have a better appreciation of the true meaning of peace.

"ON THE BEACH"

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, our former colleague, KENNETH KEATING, now a distinguished Member of the other body, thoughtfully arranged yesterday for a special Capitol Hill showing of Stanley Kramer's "On the Beach," a movie that purports to show how mankind succumbs to atomic annihilation not with a bang but a whimper.

Some may carp about terrestrial winds, rate of fallout, dissipation of radiation, and lack of obvious protective measures, but none can deny the picture's basic factual premise, namely, mankind now possesses, primed, cocked, and pointed weapons that can destroy most, if not all, of mankind.

"There is still time, brother," was the message emblazoned on the banner over an outdoor religious meeting of a doomed city. Crowds were shown in ever smaller numbers and, finally, a completely deserted scene, with papers blowing and the banner flapping forlornly.

Is there still time, brother? While there is life, salvation through religion is always possible. But is there time to change the direction of events from certain disaster for the human race?

These are questions properly put to Members of Congress, many of whom attended the showing of "On the Beach" yesterday in the new Senate Office Building. They are the ones to decide whether the Humphrey resolution repealing the Connally reservation will be passed, whether the Clark resolution for United Nations Charter review will be passed, whether we will use our considerable powers on behalf of nuclear test cessation, controlled disarmament, and a world under law.

There is time, brother, but not much.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

INTEREST RATES ON TREASURY ISSUES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 294)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

As I said in my state of the Union message, the Treasury is being prevented from taking debt management actions that are fully consistent with the public interest because of the artificial interest rate ceiling on new Treasury medium-term and long-term issues.

In a special message to the Congress on June 8, 1959, I urged the removal of this archaic restriction on flexible debt management. Congressional inaction on that request has resulted in a much more rapid increase in short-term debt than would otherwise have occurred. As a result, short-term Treasury borrowing costs have risen to the highest levels in several decades and the ability of debt management to operate in a manner consistent with sound principles of sustained economic growth has been seriously undermined.

I deem it imperative, therefore, that this restrictive ceiling be removed. I am asking the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Congress proposed legislation designed to attain this objective.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1960.

THE DANGER OF INFLATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in view of the settlement of the steel strike, of course we cannot criticize anyone yet because we do not know up to date who is entitled to credit for the settlement, but the question that occurred to me was, Are we really bright or even smart when we approve of a course of action which will cut the value of our savings, in fact of anything we have, as we will be doing if the companies increase the price of their product? And we settle other strikes on the same basis. We have been told that the companies will not increase the price of their merchandise. On that I could not express a worthwhile opinion because I have no information as to just how they are going to sell their product without reducing their dividends, which of course the stockholders do not want, or cutting the salaries of the officials of the corporations involved while increasing wages.

It is not at all likely company officials would take a voluntary cut in their compensation or fringe benefits, if they have any, or in their vacations.

Certainly we know that if things go on in a normal way workers throughout the country intend to ask for an increase in pay. As a matter of fact, it is fair to assume that Federal employees will get an increase in compensation.

Then we note, too, that other organizations want more. I do not know whether the farmers want more or not, but probably they will accept an increase as it comes along and this being an election year they have a chance to get more. Of course the veterans want more. In fact, everybody wants more. That is a laudable ambition.

There is a difference, I guess, between greed, which is an unjustifiable ambition, and ambition itself, without which we could not get along very well; but if we are to have an increase in prices, then we have gone exactly contrary to what the President asked us to do sometime ago. I recall that earlier in the session the President told us that we would have to hold the line on wages and prices or else we will have serious trouble. Perhaps I am at fault. It was my memory that the Democratic leadership, and the members of the Democratic Party too, for that matter, suggested that wherever the President was sound in his recommendations they intended to go along. Certainly the necessity for holding the line is obvious. From what the papers here print the majority party seems to have concluded that the settlement in the steel strike was a good one. But whether you are to favor granting further increases which will give us still more inflation we do not yet know. It is quite obvious, at least to me, that we are not holding the line. So this being a political year, I guess that from this time on the President will not get very much help from the Democratic leadership or party. The war is on. That is apparent since the settlement of the steel strike. Political advantage seems to be the objective. Secretary of Labor Mitchell is given the credit for the settlement. Yesterday I heard two or three Members, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN] was one. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT] was another, and so on down the line. I heard Members say the union members themselves brought about the settlement. That is it was said they were so unanimously in favor of the proposed settlement that industry was forced to agree to their demands, and therefore the union members are entitled to the credit. I assume, this being a political year, that both party leaders and both parties will claim credit, but what puzzles me is the answer to this question: Is it a good settlement? The Chicago Tribune, a stanch and tireless advocate of Americanism, the day before yesterday, said, and it expresses the sentiment of the people of the Midwest, and do not make any mistake about that, that the Labor Department was quoted as having said that inflation would be less. Let us hope the Department is right.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not read and I do not know whether the gentleman has read the actual contract that was entered into. But, I did hear Mr. Blough, I think, say that there would be no increase in the price of steel at this time.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is at this time, but in December. Or it may be the day after the November election.

Mr. WILLIS. And Mr. McDonald indicated that the contract could well result in no more strikes for a long time. I wonder if those two elements are in the contract itself?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have not seen the contract, but we know very well that they could not make a contract that there would be no more strikes that would bind others. We have been told there is a strike on the railroads coming up. Read the Young and Jerry Kluttz articles in our local papers. We know very well that Federal employees cannot strike, but they can demand an increase. This being an election year their prospects are good. And so on down the list. What about the strike in the meatpacking industry in Minnesota against Wilson & Co. where the Governor, a Democrat, Mr. Freeman, calls out the militia—the State troops. He sent them down to the struck plants to help the picket line that was trying to close the factory. He authorized the commanding officer to order the company and the press not to publish any statements giving the company's view. Then what happened? Then three Federal judges told the Governor to call his boys off. Of course, he did. Then what did the unions do? They transfer their goons from the picket line and the company plant to the homes of those who desired to work.

Inasmuch as my reference has been to a Governor who is a Democrat, I wonder why you do not call my attention to what happened in 1948, when Governor Youngdahl, a Republican, did practically the same thing. He is now a Federal judge, sitting in Washington. Are you a little slow in passing that back to us? But that is what happened. When will we all quit letting labor leaders kick us all over the lot and get around to protecting the general public, the average citizen, the little fellow that so many of us are always talking about?

Permit me to condense and restate what I have been trying to say.

WHY CHEAT OURSELVES BY INCREASING THE COST OF LIVING? BY CUTTING THE DOLLAR IN HALF?

Pointing to the obvious danger of inflation, we were told to hold the line on wages and prices; that, if wages and prices continued to advance, Government control of both would become necessary. The Chinese tried that and failed.

We were all dead tired of the steel strike which was increasing unemployment, hindering business, costing millions every day. Politicians in both major parties now claim credit for forcing the settlement, which gives no promise of reducing featherbedding, added between 30 and 40 cents per hour increase to wages in the steel industry, where workers now receive an average of $3.10 an hour. That in no way holds the line.

Now we all know that that increase will be inflationary, further cut the value of your savings, if—and I emphasize the "if"—it is added to the price of steel. I express no opinion as to whether it will be. You may. Will it be added to cost?

But this we do know. Not only is foreign competition creating unemployment in the steel industry here, but, if and when the wage advance is added, we will all, including the steelworkers, be paying more for everything in which steel is used. And where is the factory or the business which does not use steel in some form?

Let the kids answer. After the evening meal, have the children, if you have any, gather around, name a business or a product, and award a prize for the answer which shows where steel is not used in connection with your job, your business, your profession. A higher cost of living never lags far behind an increased wage.

Is there a nationwide industry, or a governmental agency, where the employees or the stockholders are not asking, in one form or another, for an increase in salary, wages, or dividends? Over the years, you have denied yourself and saved; the inflation we now have has, in purchasing power, cut in half the value of every bond, insurance policy, and dollar you own, every dollar you are earning. Want an additional cut?

The Chicago Tribune of January 10 said:

> The Labor Department said Sunday that figures show the new steel pact to be less inflationary than other recent major labor settlements.

That is equivalent to saying that the pain from the ulcerated tooth which was torturing you yesterday does not hurt quite as much today. Fine, but the ulcerated tooth is still there. Infecting others?

Settlement of the steel strike did not end nor minimize the danger of inflation. Other demands for increased wages—continued featherbedding—are coming up.

What can be done about it? Well, Congressmen might, but they will not—they will kick me for even suggesting it—take a 20-percent cut in salaries and allowances, and insist that others "hold the line" on wages and prices. By legislation, insist that free competition be made available to all; let the law of supply and demand operate. End subsidies, special privileges—ever-increasing wages and salaries for a minority—each means an increased cost of living for all. Permit a man to work where he has an acceptable job. We might then be on the way toward solving our major domestic, financial difficulties.

TAX ON TRANSPORTATION OF PERSONS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, the passage of Public Law 86–75—H.R. 7523—approved June 30, 1959, provided in part, that effective July 1, 1960, the present 10-percent tax on transportation of persons would be reduced to 5 percent.

While the reduction of this tax to 5 percent must be regarded as definite progress and an important step in eliminating an unfair, harmful, and unproductive tax, the fact remains that only half the task is done. This job should be completed this session by a complete repeal of the tax.

As this session begins, the administration is seeking a $80 billion spending budget. Federal spending continues to increase and an ever larger need for revenue exists. But this is no justification for continuing an unfair and economically harmful tax. Because fiscal considerations seem to be in the spotlight these days I want to emphasize that complete repeal of this tax will improve, not harm, this country's financial condition.

At the most, the 10-percent tax on the transportation of persons produced a gross yield of about $225 million per year. But this figure does not represent the net yield to the Government.

First of all the cost of all business travel is taken as a tax deduction by corporations and business organizations as a business expense. Thus, every dollar spent by business to pay the transportation tax produces only 48 cents of net revenue because it provides a 52-cent deduction as a business expense under the current 52-percent corporate tax rate. In 1958 it was estimated that the gross yield of the transportation tax was reduced by over $70 million by this factor alone.

Of even greater significance is the fact that one of the main purposes of the tax was to create a monetary deterrent to public use of transportation at a time when wartime travel was stretching our transportation capacity to the breaking point. There is no question but that this tax is deterring travel today and it is especially discriminatory against lower income classes. Chairman James Durfee, of the Civil Aeronautics Board, testified before the Senate Independent Office Appropriations Subcommittee last session that abolition of this tax "would produce a substantial increase in traffic" and "increase revenues to trunklines." The Interstate Commerce Commission has likewise gone on record confirming that considerable increases in traffic would result which would help to offset the ever-mounting passenger train deficit experienced by the Nation's railroads.

In 1958 the domestic transportation industry earned approximately $7 billion in passenger revenue. If removal of this deterrent tax resulted in only a 2-percent increase in net taxable income, then the amount of corporate income taxes would more than offset the yield produced by the transportation tax.

Moreover, this tax harms our international carriers as well. Although the tax applies only to travel within the United States the fact remains that if a citizen of France, for example, bought a ticket from Paris to Dallas he would pay this tax for the domestic portion of his trip if he buys his ticket from a U.S.-flag carrier but would not pay the tax if he buys from a foreign-flag carrier. Our international carriers are therefore losing untold amounts of business to foreign competitors which is not only unsound transportation policy but unsound as a fiscal matter since the taxable earnings of the international carriers are less than would otherwise be the case.

Finally, the subsidy paid by the Federal Government to the local service air carriers has been steadily increasing. In 1955 it amounted to some $21 million while today it is expected to exceed $50 million by the end of 1960. CAB Chairman Durfee testified in the Senate Appropriations hearings that abolition of the transportation tax would increase traffic in the local service industry as well and that "it would have that inevitable effect, to some degree, to reduce subsidies to local service carriers."

I do not for a minute believe that an unfair and obsolete tax can be justified on the ground that the revenue it produces is necessary as a fiscal proposition. But in the case of this transportation tax there is no fiscal justification. The plain fact is that it is an unproductive tax and I am convinced that more revenue would be forthcoming and important Federal expenditures would be saved if it were completely abolished.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE COMMISSIONED CORPS PERSONNEL ACT OF 1959

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Health and Safety Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I am herewith submitting a report on the activities of the subcommittee during the 1st session of the 86th Congress.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE COMMISSIONED CORPS PERSONNEL ACT OF 1959

The subcommittee held hearings on H.R. 6324, a bill to strengthen the Commissioned Corps of the Public Health Service through revision and extension of some of the statutory provisions relating to retirement, appointment of personnel, and other related personnel matters.

In the course of the hearings, which were held on April 16, 1959, the subcommittee heard testimony from Dr. Leroy E. Burney, Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service, and other witnesses, all of whom testified in favor of the legislation.

It is expected that the improved retirement benefits provided for in this legislation will attract into the Regular Corps and the Active Reserve Corps additional physicians, dentists, sanitary engineers, and other needed professional health personnel. It is further expected that the improved retirement benefits will cause present members of the Regular Corps and the Active Reserve Corps to remain in service for additional periods of time.

The improved retirement benefits are substantially identical with retirement benefits provided by earlier legislation for commissioned personnel of the Armed Forces.

The legislation is recommended by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and has the approval of the Bureau of the Budget.

On August 20 the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported in lieu of H.R. 6324, on which hearings had been held by the subcommittee, S. 2220, which is substantially identical with H.R. 6324 and which was passed by the Senate on July 24, 1959.

In view of the late date on which the legislation was reported from the full committee, action on this legislation was postponed until the beginning of the 2d session of the 86th Congress.

INDIAN SANITATION FACILITIES

The subcommittee held hearings on H.R. 23 and other bills—H.R. 849, 966, 1338, 1768, 1979, 2349, 2546, 3188, 3342, 3998, 6151. S. 56 reported in lieu from subcommittee and full committee; approved July 31, 1959—Public Law 86-121—dealing with Indian sanitation facilities.

The bill would clarify the authority of the Public Health Service to carry out programs relating to Indian sanitation facilities. The legislation is an outgrowth of the transfer of responsibility for Indian health from the Department of Interior to the Surgeon General and its primary purpose is to authorize the Surgeon General to construct, improve, and maintain essential Indian sanitation facilities; to acquire the necessary lands; to make agreements with appropriate public authorities, and with the Indians to be served by such facilities; and to transfer any such facilities to any State or subdivision thereof or to any Indian tribe.

The hearings extended over 2 days—May 5 and 6, 1959—and the subcommittee heard testimony in support of this legislation from representatives of the Association on American Indian Affairs and the Friends Committee on National Legislation; the Governor of the State of New Mexico, and the governor of the Indian Pueblo of Laguna, who also spoke for 19 other pueblos of New Mexico which are organized in the All-Pueblo Council. A representative of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare testified in favor of this legislation which had been recommended by the Department.

INDIAN SANITATION FACILITIES

The legislation was reported unanimously by the subcommittee and the full committee—House Report No. 589—June 29, 1959, and was signed into law on July 31, 1959—Public Law 86-121.

H.R. 6325—EXTENSION OF TRAINEESHIP PROGRAM FOR PUBLIC HEALTH PERSONNEL AND PROFESSIONAL NURSES

The subcommittee held hearings on H.R. 6325 which provides for extension of traineeship programs for public health personnel and professional nurses. In the course of the hearings, which were held on June 8, 9, and 10, 1959, the subcommittee heard testimony from representatives of the Association of Schools of Public Health, National Conference on Public Health Training; American Nurses Association; Association of State and Territorial Health Officers; American Public Health Association; the Department of Health of New York State and the State of Maryland; and the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The bill on which hearings were held included not only H.R. 6325, but also H.R. 6871, introduced by Congressman RHODES of Pennsylvania, and companion bills to the Rhodes bill introduced by other Members of Congress—H.R. 6872, H.R. 6873, H.R. 6913, H.R. 6922, H.R. 7064, and H.R. 7249. H.R. 6871, which is still pending before the committee, deals with schools of public health and other aspects of public health training. In view of the urgent need for the enactment of the bill, H.R. 6325, the subcommittee decided to report this bill and to give further separate consideration to H.R. 6871.

The full committee reported the legislation on June 29, 1959—House Report 590, 86th Congress, 1st session—and the bill became law on July 23, 1959—Public Law 86-105.

INTERNATIONAL HEALTH

The subcommittee held hearings on June 21, 22, 23, and August 4, 5, and 6, 1959, on Senate Joint Resolution 41 and other substantially identical bills—House Joint Resolutions 211, 237, 293, 361, 370, and 443—designed to establish a National Institute for International Health and Medical Research. In the course of these hearings the subcommittee heard testimony from several sponsors of these bills, many persons prominent in science and public life, representatives of numerous organizations concerned with public health and representatives of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In addition, numerous statements were submitted to the subcommittee with regard to this legislation by organizations and persons interested in this legislation.

On August 28, 1959, Chairman OREN HARRIS, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, announced that in view of the lateness of the session, the committee would not take any further action during this session on Senate Joint Resolution 41. Therefore, this legislation will be taken up in executive session by the subcommittee and the full committee when Congress reconvenes in January 1960.

SAFETY LEGISLATION

In the subcommittee reorganization at the beginning of the 86th Congress, the Subcommittee on Health and Safety assumed jurisdiction over matters in the field of safety, including highway traffic safety, which in the 84th and 85th Congresses had been handled by the Special Subcommittee on Traffic Safety, of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBERTS] was chairman.

During the first session, the subcommittee conducted hearings on five bills on the subject of motor vehicle safety. Two of these bills were reported to the full committee and were passed by the House.

Taking advantage of data developed in the detailed hearings held by the special subcommittee in the 84th and 85th Congresses, the subcommittee inquiry in the traffic safety field was concentrated on legislation concerning vehicles in an effort to make safer automobiles available and thereby to cut down the traffic accident death toll of nearly 40,000 persons a year. The subcommittee favorably reported H.R. 1341, introduced by the chairman of the subcommittee, to establish minimum safety standards for Government passenger-carrying motor vehicles, and H.R. 8238, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK], amended to direct the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to make a study of the effect of motor vehicle exhausts on human health and report to Congress within 2 years. Both bills have passed the House and are pending in Senate committees.

In the field of aviation safety, also under the jurisdiction of the subcommittee, a meeting was held in executive session with Administrator Quesada, of the new Federal Aviation Agency to discuss progress in safety rulemaking under the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, which transferred this responsibility from the Civil Aeronautics Board to the new Agency. Members of the subcommittee participated in the investigation of the accident in New York February 3, 1959, when 65 lives were lost in the crash of a new-type turboprop aircraft. Members of the subcommittee also participated in the investigation of the aircraft noise problem and attended the hearing held at New York International Airport September 7 to study the problem in that area.

The subcommittee held hearings on air pollution and favorably reported H.R. 7476—House Report 960—to extend the Federal aid program for air pollution, control, and abatement. The bill was passed by the House September 1 and went to conference. The conference report—House Report 1187—was agreed to September 14 and the bill signed into law September 22—Public Law 86-365.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the question of Canal Zone sovereignty has a long history. Before the secession on November 3, 1903, of Panama from Colombia and the diplomatic intervention of the United States in isthmian political events at that time, the sovereign of the isthmus was Colombia. After the Panama Revolution of 1903, sovereign over the area later granted to the United States was Panama.

This transfer of sovereignty from Colombia to Panama was confirmed in the preamble of the Hay-Buanau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 as being "actually vested in the Republic of Panama." This description was obviously used not to establish the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone after its acquisition by the United States, but to show the transfer of sovereignty over the area from Colombia to Panama as a result of its secession from Colombia.

In the 1903 treaty, Panama granted to the United States in perpetuity complete and exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone for purposes of construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation and protection, with "all the rights, power and authority within the zone which the United States would possess and exercise if it were sovereign of the territory and to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority."

All jurisdiction of Panama over the Canal Zone ceased on exchange of ratifications on February 26, 1904, of the 1903 treaty, after which the United States has continuously exercised exclusive sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone and Panama Canal. Since that time, the symbol of sovereignty has been the flag of the United States.

Recent pronouncements emanating from the Department of State have been to the effect that the United States, for more than 50 years, has recognized that Panama retains a "titular sovereignty" over the Canal Zone under the 1903 treaty, that the United States cannot afford to refuse to admit the "legal situation obtaining between the two countries," and that the United States should display "visual evidence that Panama does have titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone." As evidence of its interest in the Canal Zone and Panama Canal, Panama has formally requested authority to fly its flag alongside the flag of the United States in the Canal Zone.

Such views, Mr. Speaker, reflect demands of the Panamanian Government, which, as you know from recent events on the isthmus, is mob-dominated with respect to the formulation of its foreign policy. Its leaders are not thinking of their just claim for "reversionary" interest in the Canal Zone territory, in event of failure of the United States to discharge its treaty obligations with respect to the Panama Canal, but of "sovereignty."

The aims of the current isthmian agitations are: First, to fly the flag; second, to obtain dual sovereignty; and finally, nationalization by Panama.

The Secretary of State has recently written me that in recognizing "titular sovereignty" no surrender of sovereignty on the part of the United States is or can be involved.

Any such view, Mr. Speaker, reflects a naivete that is incomprehensible. The foreign policy of Panama for the last 50 years has been to obtain for Panama conditions similar to those that were contained in the 1903 treaty with Colombia, which amounted to a dual control. Today, the ultimate Panamanian aim, abetted by Communist monitors, is complete control.

The hoisting of the Panama flag in the Canal Zone would not be an empty gesture and would not be accepted as such by Panamanian radicals who dominate their government. Its effect would be catastrophic, for the day it is formally hoisted marks the beginning of the end of exclusive U.S. control over the Panama Canal.

Here I wish to stress that where grave responsibility such as that involved in the treaty obligations to maintain and operate the Panama Canal must be accompanied by undiluted authority. Hoisting the Panama flag would be the symbol for such dilution.

Finally, may I ask, How could the United States carry out its responsibility under the treaty and the provisions of the Panama Canal Act for vesting supreme control over the Panama Canal and Canal Zone Government during war in the commanding general of the U.S.

Army on the isthmus if there were other than exclusive jurisdiction?

To all such questions an opposite view is absolutely incomprehensible.

In view of the vital need for clarification of the Congress, position on Panama Canal Zone sovereignty, I have introduced the following concurrent resolution:

Resolution expressing the sense and judgment of the Congress with respect to Canal Zone sovereignty

Whereas the United States, under the Hay-Buanau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 with Panama, acquired complete and exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone in perpetuity for construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection; and

Whereas all jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama over the Canal Zone ceased on exchange of ratifications of the 1903 treaty on February 26, 1904; and

Whereas since that time the United States has continuously exercised exclusive sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone and Panama Canal; and

Whereas where responsibility is imposed there must be given for its effectuation adequate authority; and with respect to the Panama Canal the treaty of 1903 so provided; and

Whereas the United States has fully and effectively discharged all its treaty obligations with respect to the Panama Canal and the only legitimate interest that Panama can have in the sovereignty of the Canal Zone is one of reversionary character that can never become operative unless the United States should abandon the canal enterprise; and

Whereas the policy of the United States since President Hayes' message to the Congress on March 8, 1880, has been for an interoceanic canal "under American control," that is to say, under the control of the United States; and

Whereas the grant by Panama to the United States of exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone for the aforesaid purposes was an absolute, indispensable condition precedent to the great task undertaken by the United States in the construction and perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the Panama Canal, for the benefit of the entire world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring):

(1) That the United States, under treaty provisions, constitutionally acquired, and holds, in perpetuity, exclusive sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone for the construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection; and

(2) That there can be no just claim by the Republic of Panama for the exercise of any sovereignty of whatever character over the Canal Zone so long as the United States discharges its duties and obligations with respect to the canal; and

(3) That the formal display of any official flag over the Canal Zone other than that of the United States is violative of law, treaty, international usage, and the historic canal policy of the United States as fully upheld by its highest courts and administrative officials; and would lead to confusion and chaos in the administration of the Panama Canal enterprise.

HIGHER BENEFITS UNDER THE LONGSHOREMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to bring the weekly benefits provided under the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act into line with the basic purposes of this law. Early introduction of this measure will permit, I believe, sufficient time for committee study. I am hopeful that those who agree with the intent and purpose of this proposal will introduce similar legislation, and, indeed, I am hopeful that those who do not agree will find an opportunity to discuss this matter with me.

The brief explanation that follows will show the need for this measure and establish clearly why Congress should act favorably on it.

The Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act covers some 500,000 workers engaged in maritime employments. Included under its coverage are longshoremen or stevedores, ship repairmen, ship servicemen, harbor workers, and other employees engaged in employments on the navigable waters of the United States, but not including seamen. The Longshore Act is also the basic compensation act for employees privately employed in the District of Columbia and for employees of contractors holding contracts with the Government whose operations take place outside continental United States.

The Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act is the only Federal compensation statute applying to workers in private industry. The other Federal statute in this field, the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, embraces Government employees.

The main purpose of my bill is to reconcile the maximum weekly benefit allowable under the Longshore Act for disability with the established principle that benefits should equal two-thirds of average weekly earnings. This principle was basic to the establishment of compensation insurance throughout the country. It is clearly enunciated not only in most State laws, but also in many provisions of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. Unfortunately, the original intent of compensation insurance has been seriously undermined by the inclusion in most of these laws of a dollar ceiling on weekly benefits. In the early years of compensation insurance, such ceilings did not present a critical problem, since the average ceiling was generally above the amount necessary to provide a benefit of two-thirds of weekly earnings. Thus, when the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act was passed in 1927, the $25 ceiling compared with average earnings of less than $30 weekly, so that the overwhelming majority of affected employees got what the act intended. Today, however, the dollar ceilings in the Longshore Act as well as in most State laws deprive workers of their proper benefits.

The present ceiling in the Longshore Act, which was set in 1956, is $54 weekly. This is far too low in relation to actual wage levels prevailing in most trades covered by the act. For example, figures made available on earnings of longshoremen in the New York area show that over 50 percent of the men are earning on an annual basis more than $81 weekly, the figure used for the present $54 benefit. On the West Coast, according to available information, better than 70 percent of longshoremen are making earnings which figure out to a weekly average above $81. Ship workers and similar crafts with wage levels close to longshoremen are likewise in a position where most are unable to obtain a full benefit. In short, the present dollar ceiling shortchanges the majority of covered employees when they are disabled.

To correct this inequity now applying to benefits under the Longshore Act, I am proposing that the same dollar ceiling used in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act be incorporated in the longshore statute. This ceiling, which is set at $525 monthly, was approved by Congress as far back as 1949. Translated into a weekly equivalent which drops the fractional part of a dollar, this ceiling is $121, which is the figure I am using in my bill. Such a maximum would bring a genuine two-thirds benefit to over 90 percent of the workers covered by the Longshore Act.

At this point, it is important to understand that establishment of the ceiling I am proposing does not mean that covered employees will receive that much in weekly benefits. They will only be eligible for two-thirds of their actual average weekly earnings, up to a maximum of $121 weekly. Workers in the low brackets, as are many in maritime and in the District of Columbia, will get benefits equivalent to two-thirds of their weekly pay. My proposal will not mean any windfall, but only what is proper under the two-thirds formula.

The basic policy on which my amendment is based was clearly stated in the report of the House Committee on Education and Labor when it sponsored the 1949 amendments to the Federal Employees' Compensation Act. The report said this:

> Any flat monthly maximum, the effect of which inevitably in some cases prevents the employee from receiving a fair proportion of his wage loss in total and partial disability cases, is, by its very nature, unrealistic and inequitable.

With that policy I thoroughly agree, and I am sure every forward thinking leader in the field of social insurance shares a similar belief. It is now only just and fair that Congress should apply that policy to the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act by revising its present unrealistic and inequitable ceiling.

This action aside from providing maritime employees with what they are entitled to under the law, has a larger significance. Traditionally, the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Act, like other Federal welfare legislation, has served as an example for State compensation laws. The 1956 increase in the Longshore Act benefits subsequently brought improvements in most local statutes. Just this last year, some 29 State legislatures, according to the Department of Labor, increased weekly benefits under their compensations laws. My own State of California boosted the weekly maximum for temporary total disability to $65 weekly. Such justified improvements will be accelerated and brought to their proper levels by favorable action on my bill.

In addition to revising the maximum and minimum ceiling in the Longshore Act to correspond with the figures set in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, I am proposing several other related changes.

The computation of death benefits would be revised to correspond with the new maximum and minimum. Likewise, the present dollar limitation on total benefits as set forth in section 14(m) would be repealed. Finally, benefits would be retroactive to the date of injury if the disability exceeds 21 days, instead of the existing period of 28 days. These additional amendments would bring the affected provisions into line with the Federal Employees' Compensation Act.

The changes proposed under my bill add up to simple equity for the more than half a million employees affected by the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. My bill will restore the original premise that underlies benefits in workmen's compensation—that they should equal two-thirds of weekly loss in wages. I commend this bill for serious study by my colleagues, and it is my hope that it will receive early and favorable consideration by the Committee on Education and Labor.

A LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL TO IMPROVE THE LEVEL OF TELEVISION AND RADIO BROADCASTING IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced H.R. 9549, a bill intended to improve the level of television and radio broadcasting in the United States.

I would briefly summarize the major aims of H.R. 9549 as follows:

First. To establish minimum standards of public service programing for all TV and radio stations.

Second. To stimulate the broadcasting of educational and cultural programs.

Third. To establish a system of competitive bidding for broadcasting licenses.

Fourth. To set higher standards for the Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. Speaker, the American people and the Congress are deeply disturbed—and justly so—at what has been going on in the commercial broadcasting industry.

Recent disclosures of rigged quiz shows and "payola" are but two shocking symptoms of a deep-seated ailment. Sensational as they may be, they are merely today's surface outbreak of more basic difficulties built up over the years in an industry that has grown too fast and too profitably to catch up with its responsibilities to the public.

One of the basic problems has been the failure of the broadcasting industry itself, and of the Federal Communications Commission which oversees its operations, to accept fully the fact that a grant of the use of the public airwaves for commercial broadcasting carries with it a responsibility to advance education and culture and to bring the best programs, and a balanced diet of programs, to the people of the United States.

FORGOTTEN PROMISES

In times of trouble, such as now, the industry and the FCC pay lipservice to these ideals. The broadcasting industry promises to clean its own house. The FCC promises to make the industry do just that, or at least to help it.

Yet after each of these agonizing reappraisals, we seem to come out with just as many—if not more—westerns, private eyes, diskjockey shows, and old movies as we had before. Maybe they are better westerns or private eyes, with new formats, new faces, and bigger budgets—but the diet served the public continues to be beamed at the lowest common denominator of public taste.

The broadcasting industry—and the FCC goes along with it—appears to have set two main goals for itself: to make money, which they do very well, and to entertain, which they sometimes do very well.

But, with a few exceptions, the goal of contributing to education, to information, to culture, is far down the industry's list—if it is there at all. Just because the good guys always beat the bad guys—usually after several killings—does not make a program educational, or even true.

Our present broadcasting laws speak often of the public interest. The industry and the FCC, as a result, have spoken of public service programs, but without requiring them or defining them. It is my belief that if we both define and require public service programing for all broadcasting stations, we will be on our way to improving the level of television and radio broadcasting, without harming the commercial broadcasting industry or the other industries which depend upon it.

Since that is the intent of my bill, and since that also happens to be what the broadcasting industry and its friends claim to want, I expect to have their support for this legislation.

DETAILS OF THE BILL

In detail, H.R. 9549 proposes the following changes in the Federal Communications Act:

First. To declare that Congress created the FCC not only to make available an adequate communications system, but also "for the purpose of assuring that broadcasting stations shall be operated in the public interest and in such a manner as to advance education and culture in the United States and to bring the best programs, regardless of kind, to the people of the United States."

Second. Direct the FCC to establish minimum standards of public service programing for each broadcasting station.

(a) The bill itself would require each station to devote at least 20 percent of each broadcast day to public service programs, of which not less than 1 hour per day must occur between 7 p.m. and 10 p.m., the prime evening hours.

(b) The FCC could establish higher minimum standards in any community, based upon public comment, investigations or public hearings in a community.

(c) The bill establishes a broad definition of public service programs: "programs of which the content tends primarily to advance education and culture, or to inform the public of events or issues of local, State, National, and international importance."

Third. To assist the FCC in further defining public service programs and in establishing minimum standards of public service programing, the bill would create an Advisory Board on Education and Culture. The United States Commissioner of Education would be the chairman. Six members representing the general public, and not connected with the broadcasting industry, would be appointed by the FCC Chairman.

MONITORING OF STATIONS

Fourth. Direct the FCC to monitor broadcasting stations to determine whether minimum standards of public service programing, and other requirements, are being fulfilled.

Fifth. Establish a system of competitive bidding for broadcasting licenses.

(a) The bill would establish priority categories for license applicants—first, priority to an applicant "predominantly locally owned" with no interest in other mediums of mass communication; second, priority to an applicant "predominantly locally owned"; and, third, priority to all others.

(b) If a single applicant for a particular license stood alone in a higher category than all other applicants, the FCC would grant the license to him, if otherwise qualified under the law.

(c) If two or more applicants for a license fell into the same high category, and were otherwise qualified, the FCC would call for competitive bids.

(d) The bill provides for bids in two parts: First, bids in terms of public service programs; second, bids in cash amounts. The FCC would give "such weight as it may determine appropriate to each part of the bids of the applicants," then award the license to the highest bidder.

AN EDUCATIONAL FUND

Sixth. Funds received from successful bidders would go into a special educational and cultural television and radio fund, from which the FCC, with the advice of the Advisory Board on Education and Culture, could make loans or grants to nonprofit broadcasting stations or organizations "for the purpose of furthering the presentation of educational and cultural television and radio programs in the United States."

Seventh. Establish higher standards for the FCC.

The bill would repeal a provision permitting FCC members to accept honorariums; enact a code of ethics for the FCC which would prohibit accepting favors from the broadcasting industry; and prohibit anyone from outside the FCC from consulting "except on the public record with any member of the Commission or its staff upon any question of fact or law in issue" in any proceeding before the Commission. The bill would also increase the terms of FCC members from 7 to 14 years, raise their salaries by $2,000 a year, require Commissioners to be of known integrity, and states that neither membership nor nonmembership in a political party should be a criterion for appointment to the FCC.

The provisions relating to the FCC itself were part of a bill which I introduced in April 1958 following disclosure of scandals involving FCC members. Such changes to uplift the FCC are still necessary.

But I want to emphasize that the main purposes of my bill introduced today are to improve programing, to emphasize education and culture, and to set up a bidding procedure for broadcast licenses between qualified applicants who, because of local ownership, are most likely to serve the best interests of their own communities.

A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to establish minimum standards of public service programing for broadcasting stations, to further the broadcasting of educational and cultural programs, to establish a system of competitive bidding for broadcasting licenses, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. That this Act may be cited as the "Communications Act Amendments of 1960."

SEC. 2. Section 1 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is further amended by inserting, after the words "through the use of wire and radio communication", the following: "for the purpose of assuring that broadcasting stations shall be operated in the public interest and in such a manner as to advance education and culture in the United States and to bring the best programs, regardless of kind, to the people of the United States,".

SEC. 3. Section 4(b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is further amended by deleting "; but this shall not apply to the presentation or delivery of publications or papers for which a reasonable honorarium or compensation may be accepted"; and by adding at the end of said subsection the following: "Members shall be of known integrity, and neither membership nor nonmembership in any political party shall be a criterion for selection".

SEC. 4. Section 4(c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is further amended by deleting the words "seven years; except" and substituting the words "fourteen years; except"; and by adding at the end of said subsection the following: "The amendment made by this section shall apply with respect to persons appointed after the enactment of this Act".

SEC. 5. Section 4(d) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Each Commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $22,000 payable in monthly installments, and the Chairman, during the period of his service as Chairman, shall receive an annual salary of $22,500. All necessary expenditures incurred by the Commissioners in attending not more than two communications industry conventions in any given calendar year shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the Chairman of the Commission or his designee."

SEC. 6. Section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(p) It is deemed contrary to the policy of this Act for a member or employee of the Commission to—

"(1) engage, directly or indirectly, in any personal business transaction or private arrangement for personal profit which accrues from or is based upon his official position or authority or upon confidential information which he gains by reason of such position or authority;

"(2) accept, directly or indirectly, any valuable gift, favor, or service from any person with whom he deals on behalf of the United States;

"(3) discuss or entertain proposals for future employment by any person outside the Government with whom he is dealing on behalf of the United States;

"(4) divulge confidential commercial or economic information to any unauthorized person, or release any such information in advance of authorization for its release;

"(5) become unduly involved, through frequent or expensive social engagements or otherwise, with any person outside the Government with whom he deals on behalf of the United States; or

"(6) act in any official matter with respect to which there exists a personal interest incompatible with an unbiased exercise of official judgment.

"(7) fail reasonably to restrict his personal business affairs so as to avoid conflicts of interests with his official duties."

SEC. 7. Section 303 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is further amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(s) Monitor each broadcasting station to determine whether the minimum standards of public service programing established for such station are being fulfilled and whether all other requirements of this Act and of Commission regulations are being complied with."

SEC. 8. Section 308 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is further amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(d) In addition to information required by the Commission under section 308(b), the Commission shall establish minimum standards of public service programing for each broadcasting station, and shall refuse to consider applications for broadcasting licenses, or modifications or renewals thereof, unless each such application meets or exceeds such minimum standards:

"(1) The following types of programs may be defined by the Commission as public service programs: programs of which the content tends primarily to advance education and culture, or to inform the public of events or issues of local, State, National, or international importance.

"(2) To assist the Commission in defining public service programs and in establishing minimum standards of public service programing, there is hereby created an Advisory Board on Education and Culture, to be composed of a chairman and six members, none of whom shall be a member of or in any way connected with the broadcasting industry. The United States Commissioner of Education shall be the chairman of the Advisory Board. The six members of the Advisory Board shall be appointed by the Chairman of the Commission, shall serve at his pleasure, and shall represent the general public. The Commission shall furnish from its staff such technical and clerical assistance as the Advisory Board may require.

"(3) In establishing minimum standards for public service programing, the Commission shall require each broadcasting station to devote not less than 20 percent of each broadcast day to public service programs, of which not less than one hour of each broadcast day shall occur between the hours of 7 p.m. and 10 p.m.

"(4) Nothing in this Act shall prohibit the Commission from requiring higher minimum standards of public service programing than specified in section 308(d)(3). In making such a determination, the Commission shall invite public comment on the broadcasting needs of each community being served or to be served by one or more broadcasting stations, and may conduct investigations or hold public hearings in any community if deemed necessary."

SEC. 9. Section 309(a) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by substituting in lieu thereof the following language:

"(a) (1) The Commission shall examine applications submitted under section 308, and shall consider only such applications as will, if granted, serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity, and where the applicant meets the requirements, set up by this Act and by Commission regulations, as to citizenship, character, and financial, technical, programing, and other qualifications and standards. From among such applications, the Commission shall then classify them into one of the following three categories: (1) first, priority, where applicant is predominantly locally owned, and has no interest, directly or through its owners, in other mediums of mass communication; (2) second priority, where applicant is predominantly locally owned; (3) third priority, all other such applicants. The Commission shall then grant the permit or license to the applicant in the highest priority category: Provided, That where there is a more than one such qualified applicant in the category, the Commission shall, pursuant to regulation, call for bids from all qualified applicants in the category. The Commission shall invite bids from each such applicant in two parts: (1) bids in terms of public service programing; (2) bids in cash amounts. Giving such weight as it may determine appropriate to each part of the bids of the applicants, the Commission shall grant the permit or license to the highest bidder. The cash amount paid pursuant to any such successful bid shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States in a special fund, established by this Act to be known as the Educational and Cultural Television and Radio Fund.

"(2) The Commission, with the advice of the Advisory Board on Education and Culture, shall have authority to make loans and/or grants from the Educational and Cultural Television and Radio Fund to nonprofit broadcasting stations and nonprofit organizations for the purpose of furthering the presentation of educational and cultural television and radio programs in the United States."

SEC. 10. Section 309(b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by striking the first four sentences, and substituting the following: "The Commission, in carrying out its responsibilities under section 309(a) hereof, shall notify all applicants and other known parties in interest of all objections made to the applications as well as the source and nature of such objections. Following such notice, the applicant shall be given an opportunity to reply. If the Commission, after considering such reply, shall be unable without further consideration to award the permit or license sought, it shall formally designate the applications for hearing, and shall notify the applicants and all other known parties in interest of such action and the grounds and reasons therefor, specifying with particularity the matters and things in issue but not including issues or requirements phrased generally."

SEC. 11. Section 310(b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by substituting a semicolon in lieu of the final period thereof, and by adding the following: "Provided, That where a person in a higher priority classification under the priority categories established in Section 309(a)(1) is willing to make an offer as advantageous as that of the proposed transferee or assignee, the transfer to the proposed transferee or assignee shall not be approved."

SEC. 12. Section 409(c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by adding the following additional subsection:

"(4) In any proceeding, whether rulemaking or adjudication, no person outside the Commission shall consult except on the public record, with any member of the Commission or its staff upon any fact or question of law in issue. Any Commissioner or staff member receiving a communication relating to any proceeding, whether rulemaking or adjudication, shall place such communication (or a memorandum stating the circumstances and substance of such communication if such communication was made orally) in the public record."

TODAY THE U.S. TREASURY WILL GIVE THE MONEYLENDERS THE BIGGEST BARGAIN IN HISTORY: WILL SELL 1-YEAR OBLIGATIONS AT AN INTEREST RATE OF 5 PERCENT OR ABOVE IN A SQUEEZE PLAY ON CONGRESS TO OBTAIN REMOVAL OF THE 42-YEAR-OLD LEGAL CEILING ON INTEREST RATES; CONGRESS MUST ACT TO CLOSE THE LOOPHOLE IN THE LAW BY MAKING SHORT-TERM BORROWING SUBJECT TO THE INTEREST RATE CEILING

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, before the day is over the Treasury will give the moneylenders the biggest bargain in history. Furthermore, our money managers in the Treasury, in the Federal Reserve System, and, of course, in Wall Street are so anxious that Congress and the general public be aware of this bargain that they have been advertising in advance. This is part of the campaign to make the American people believe that such giveaways of their money are necessary because Congress refuses to repeal the legal ceiling on interest rates at which the Treasury can issue long-term bonds.

THE GIVEAWAY IS ADVERTISED—WITH THE BLAME GIVEN TO CONGRESS

This advertising is in the form of newspaper analyses, columnists' reports, private financial letters, and so on, of which we have been seeing a great flood over the past week. All advise what the price will be of the securities which the Treasury is putting up for auction today—after the bids have been made and the Treasury has made its decision as to the lowest price it will accept. All advise that the price of the securities to be sold today—which is to be $1.5 billion of Treasury bills maturing in 1 year—will top 5 percent, and perhaps go as high as 5¼ percent. Thus the New York Times of last Sunday carried a feature article by one Paul Heffernan which states in highly attractive tones what the price of these securities will be, after the moneylenders have submitted their bids, and the Treasury has decided which bids it will accept. And, of course, this article follows the custom of the day and blames the whole matter on Congress, refusal to lift the 4½-percent ceiling on long-term issues.

If the rate on these 1-year loans turns out to be as predicted, it will be even more fabulous than the rate the Treasury gave on the famous "magic 5s" which it issued last September at a fixed rate of 5 percent. The "magic 5s" were for a period much longer than the bills being issued today. In fact, they carry a maturity date of 4 years and 10 months—just short of the 5 years at which time they would have had to comply with the legal ceiling.

MONEY MANAGERS ARE DEMANDING ONLY THE BLUE SKY TO LIMIT INTEREST RATES

For more than a year now Congress has been the target of the most vigorous and concerted campaign ever waged against a Congress during my years here, all in an effort to force repeal of an interest rate law which has stood unassaulted and unchallenged through wars, depressions, market crashes, and other crises which this Nation has weathered in the past 42 years. And if there are limits to which our money managers will not go in their determination to rid themselves of a Woodrow Wilson reform and turn the clock back to pre-World War I, those limits are not now visible even with the aid of long-distance radar.

How high do they plan to push interest rates?

They will not say. They will give no assurances whatever. They demand the blue sky as their ceiling. They do not ask that the legal ceiling be increased to 5 percent, 6 percent, 10 percent, or even 20 percent. They demand that it be removed. And they feel so confident that they can force Congress to yield to their demands, they do not even bother to promise a stratolayer which they will refuse to exceed.

I have inquired of the Federal Reserve authorities if they would offer some assurance as to what the probable maximum rate would be if the ceiling were removed, and they have refused to specify any maximum.

Similarly, I recently asked Secretary Anderson what assurance he might have from the Federal Reserve people, if any, as to how high they would raise the long-term rate if the ceiling were removed. His answer, which was given in a letter just last month, is to the effect that he has no assurance whatever that interest rates will not be raised above any specified maximum if the ceiling is removed.

EPITAPH FOR A 10-PERCENTER

My own estimate is that our money managers are really shooting for 10 percent, and I am reminded of the epitaph which appears on the tombstone of a gentleman who for many years was the local banker of a small town out West. This banker was notorious for having extracted a 10-percent interest rate from the community. His epitaph reads:

Here lies old "Ten Percent."
The more he made, the less he spent;
The more he got, the less he lent.
He's gone, we don't know where he went;
But if to heaven his soul has went,
He'll own the place and charge them rent.

And, of course, there have been other famous bankers who have extracted even greater interest rates, and our history records varying experiences and episodes growing out of such practices. There was, for example, one banker out toward North Dakota who gained local fame as a "40 percenter," and during the Green Corn Rebellion he was the first man to be shot at.

HIGH INTEREST IS GOOD FOR YOU?

Even today if a local banker looked his customers in the eye and told them he is about to jack up interest rates because this will be good for them and will stop inflation, I doubt that he would fool anybody. But, of course, things have become much more complicated as greedy manipulations have become more remote and impersonal, originating with decisions in Wall Street and carried out with the help of a misguided Government in Washington. Interest-rate greed is now presented as something good for the country. It is the subject of a great crusade and is surrounded with all kinds of inspiring slogans and quick, pithy little arguments thought up by the public relations experts.

The principal argument being shot at us these days today is to this effect: Since interest yields on long-term bonds—bonds to mature in 10, 20, or even 30 years—are considerably less than 5 percent, and even less than interest rates being paid on money borrowed for only 3 months, the Treasury could manage the debt cheaper if only Congress would repeal the 4¼-percent rate on long-term bonds. According to this charming little argument, the Treasury could then borrow money for 10-, 20-, or 30-year periods at a lesser rate than it is paying for 1-year money, and even 3-month money. "Shift more of the debt to long-term," we are told, "and interest rates will come down." What nonsense.

Is there a Member of Congress who supposes that at a time when fertilizer prices have gone sky high, any sensible farmer would enter into a contract at such a price to purchase his fertilizer requirements for the next 20 or 30 years? No, I think not. Any half-bright farmer would buy only his immediate requirements at such a price. He would wait for the price to come down before making a long-term contract, if ever.

Yet the administration and the big bankers are today telling us that just the opposite policy is the only sound and sensible policy for the Government to follow. We are being urged to permit, aid, and abet a massive refinancing of the Federal debt from short-term issues to long-term issues, not just at the recordbreaking rates now prevailing, but at even more fantastic rates which are not now possible under existing law.

Repeal the existing law, and the people who have driven short-term rates up into the stratosphere will promptly launch long-term rates into the stratosphere.

IS SHORT-TERM DEBT MORE INFLATIONARY THAN LONG-TERM DEBT?

Another quick, condensed, and slogan-like argument we are hearing is, of course, that issuing short-term debt is more inflationary than issuing long-term debt.

And why is issuing short-term debt more inflationary than issuing long-term debt?

One of the quick answers is that when the banks buy short-term issues, they can take these into a Federal Reserve bank and borrow on them—a process that increases the money supply. More nonsense.

The member banks of the Federal Reserve System are now holding more than $50 billion of Federal securities. No one of these securities is any more or less eligible for a Federal Reserve loan than any other. Furthermore, if bank borrowing from the Federal Reserve banks were limited only by the banks' willingness to borrow and their ability to pledge Federal obligations as security the entire $50 billion of their holdings would have long since been pledged to secure an approximately equal amount of Federal Reserve loans. Yet the record shows that as of last week, the member banks had outstanding only slightly more than $1 billion of loans from the Federal Reserve banks.

The essential point being overlooked in this propaganda argument is that the banks have no automatic privilege of borrowing from the Federal Reserve banks on Government securities, nor on anything else. The limit on such borrowing is not the amount of Federal securities which the banks could pledge nor the banks' willingness to borrow at the current discount rate. The limit to such borrowing is fixed solely by Federal Reserve policy. In other words, the amount of loans which the Federal Reserve banks will make is predetermined by Federal Reserve policy, and this is the amount of the loans the Federal Reserve banks make.

ARE SHORT-TERM ISSUES "MORE LIKE MONEY"?

There is another quick explanation of the slogan that issuing short-term debt is "more inflationary" than issuing long-term debt. It is that short-term securities are "more like money" than long-term securities. More nonsense.

True, in issuing a new obligation the Treasury may, and sometimes does, decide that it will make the issue eligible for purchase by the commercial banks. This is the case of the 1-year bills being auctioned today. And in this case, the commercial banks add to the money supply an amount of new money equal to the amount of the securities they purchase. In other words, the commercial banks create the money with which they buy the securities; but this is no more true of the banks' purchasing short-term securities than it is of their purchasing long-term securities. Both are precisely the same. And the Treasury is equally in a position to decide how much, if any, of a new security it will allow commercial banks to purchase.

So the frequent statement that short-term debt is "more like money," used in the context in which it is being used, is simply another one of those unfounded and misleading slogans. Such is the nature of the propaganda arguments made in support of the idea that the Government should do what the local banker would not do in plain view of the customers who support and patronize the local bank.

CONGRESS SHOULD ENACT A CEILING ON SHORT-TERM INTEREST RATES

Certainly one thing is clear: Congress should stand firm against the proposal to saddle the Federal Government with high interest rates for the next 10, 20, 30 years, or longer. Assuming that Congress is willing to go along with high interest rates for periods of up to 5 years, then I say let the present administration contract the Government to pay these high rates for periods up to 5 years, but no longer. But as for my part, I would not go even that far. Good sense, I think, should lead us to disapprove the present high rates on short-term loans.

The duty of issuing money and regulating the value of money is a duty of Congress. It is reserved to Congress by the Constitution. This is our problem. The Congress has, of course, delegated these duties, under certain conditions and limitations, to the Federal Reserve System, which is supposed to be an arm of the Congress. Now we sit idly by and watch the Federal Reserve raise interest rates greatly beyond what many of us would approve. The Federal Reserve people have been able to do this simply because they have found a legal loophole in the limitations and conditions previously laid down by Congress. I doubt that anyone thought, when the limit on long-term rates was established, that short-term rates could as a practical matter be driven and held above the long-term rate. Nevertheless, the technical loophole is there; the law is silent on short-term rates, and, as has now been demonstrated, the loophole can be exploited.

Consequently, it seems clear to me that Congress should now amend the law to close this loophole. It should enact a ceiling on short-term rates and thus require the Federal Reserve to carry out the delegated responsibilities of Congress in a way which will permit the Government to live within that ceiling.

A BIGGER HIGH-INTEREST CRUSADE IS COMING

The signs are now clear. The crusaders are upon us. Short of such an affirmative action on the part of Congress, we are going to be in for a great deal more pressure of the same kind as has already been applied, except that this pressure is going to be intensified and increased—if that is possible.

Already the financial journals are predicting that the Federal Reserve will soon raise its discount rate above the already fantastic rate of 4 percent. Such a report appears in the Wall Street Journal of this morning. And, of course, we have recently seen in the daily press an account of the confidential letter issued by the Investment Bankers Association to its members, giving its informed and expert judgment that another increase in the discount rate is coming. A discount rate above 4 percent will signal a general level of interest rates higher than anything we have yet seen at any time during this administration. And, of course, the present rates on short-term Treasury issues are already well above anything we have previously seen during this administration. The crusaders are quite determined. They have in mind a goal which will mean millions, even billions, to the lucky few, but which, unfortunately, represents a raid on the pocketbooks of 99 percent of the American people.

For those Members who may have overlooked the press reports I have referred to, I will insert in the RECORD the New York Times article of Sunday and the Wall Street Journal article of this morning:

TREASURY OFFERS ITS BEST BARGAIN—BILLS UP FOR SALE TUESDAY ARE LIKELY TO YIELD ABOUT 5¼ PERCENT TO INVESTORS

(By Paul Heffernan)

Unless people have lost all interest in arithmetic, the 12 Federal Reserve banks should be flooded tomorrow and Tuesday with subscription checks for the Treasury's newest public offering of debt securities—$1,500 million of discount bills to come due in a year.

This 1-day sale is the best bargain ever offered in Treasury securities. Because of extraordinary conditions momentarily prevailing in the Government securities market, the bills up for sale Tuesday are likely to yield to subscribers an investment return of more than 5 percent—perhaps even more than 5¼ percent.

This is even better than the deal investors got last fall from a new issue of Treasury notes—the "magic 5s"—bearing 5 percent interest. The 5s now are selling above 100, with the result that the yield to maturity comes to about 4.8 percent.

Moreover, the 5 percent notes will not be paid off until August 1964, while the discount bills up for sale Tuesday will come due within a year. Besides, no secondary market commission expense need be incurred in subscribing to the new issue. Most banks will enter subscriptions willingly in behalf of customers.

The Federal Reserve System district banks, as fiscal agents for the Treasury, will take subscriptions direct. The district banks of the Reserve System are in New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Richmond, Atlanta, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Dallas, Denver, and San Francisco.

BIDDING COMPETITIVE

The bills will be sold at competitive bidding, with yields to buyers depending on the discount cost incurred by the Treasury. Subscriptions for less than $200,000 on a noncompetitive basis will be received, with the price being determined by averaging the competitive tenders. Even subscriptions of only $1,000 will be received.

Yields of 5 percent or more on Treasury bills are an experience new to this country. They first appeared last year. Last week, 13 of the Treasury's 32 outstanding issues of bills sold at discount rates yielding buyers 5 percent or more.

There are two major reasons. One has to do with economic fundamentals; the other with the arbitrary continuing application of long-term debt-cost legislation adopted by Congress during World War I and not since amended.

The economic forces pressing short-term interest rates to high levels stem from the industrial and population boom in which the postwar world is caught. In periods of broad and sustained economic expansion, the greatest pressure falls on short-term lending rates. Savings in even the economically advanced countries in such periods tend to be outstripped by demand for capital, with the result that borrowers are driven to the traditional lenders at short term—the commercial banks.

When the demand for credit begins to deplete the reserve funds that the banks must maintain, the deposit institutions replenish reserves by selling prime investments, such as Treasury securities. As they run out of these, the competition for short-term money becomes intense. Short rates rise sharply as borrowers bid for the shrinking supply of available bank money.

Under such boom pressures, relief is not to be looked for from central banking institutions, because of the inflationary danger attached to diluting a money supply whose purchasing power is threatened with deterioration. This is the financial side of the U.S. economy today. By and large, the same goes for the world's other money centers.

Relief from pressure on the short-term market is usually available in such periods through the expedient of borrowing at long term. This is done anyway by private corporations, if only for the sake of maintaining a balanced debt structure.

The Treasury could probably borrow at less than 5 percent at long term except for legislation adopted at the time of World War I, imposing a cost ceiling of 4¼ percent on any borrowings of more than 5-year term.

This ban is probably the major reason why certain Treasury securities of under 5-year terms now yield more than 5 percent. Until Congress lifts the 4¼ percent cost ceiling, the Treasury has no choice but to continue to offer short-dated obligations.

Washington says it is likely that the cost ceiling will be raised by Congress this year. Congress can be expected to be aroused by the Treasury's incurring costs well above 5 percent at short term when it could raise the money at long term for materially less.

If the long-term cost ceiling does not last much longer, it is conceivable that the high yields now available on discount bills will not last, either. But even if the present tightness in bank money should continue, and even if the high yields of the short market should be exceeded later this year, it is hard to see how individual investors of modest means would be imprudent in joining the growing army of subscribers to the Treasury's short-dated discount-bill debt.

It is possible, of course, that the basic economic problems of the future may carry and keep the short-term interest structure even higher than the levels of today. Forces the world over are engendering demands on the capital markets for which there is little precedent.

There is a constant expansion of consumer demand, one fed by the achievement of the capitalist system in bringing bank and finance company credit on a rationalized basis to the door of the humblest workman. The Communist nations are attempting to adapt this to the socialist system, and, if they succeed, consumer demand will be broadened spectacularly.

The technological dividends of World War II have involved industry in a state of permanent revolution marked by an insatiable demand for new capital.

Finally, underdeveloped nations are resolved to escape from stone-age practices and join the modern world of advanced industrialization. Such a transformation requires the sympathetic understanding of the advanced nations but it needs their capital even more.

INVESTMENT BANKERS EXPECT DISCOUNT RATE TO BE RAISED BUT ARE UNCERTAIN ON TIMING

A majority in financial circles is convinced a rise in the Federal Reserve Board's discount rate is in the cards—the only question is in the timing.

A weekly letter of the Investment Bankers Association advised members yesterday that rumors of an increase in the discount rate—the fee Federal Reserve banks charge on loans to member commercial banks—"appeared to be well founded," the Associated Press reported from Washington.

Asked about the AP dispatch, an IBA official said the letter was a private weekly report prepared by an economist of the trade group for its members and did not represent any official IBA policy.

The discount rate moved up to 4 percent from 3½ percent last September. The IBA letter noted that 3-month Treasury bills have been selling recently at yields topping 4½ percent. It noted the Federal Reserve Board normally doesn't like to keep the discount rate below the bill rate for any length of time, on the ground that, theoretically, at least, banks could borrow from Federal Reserve banks at the discount rate to invest in higher yielding bills.

The letter said also a rise in the prime lending rate, the rate charged the biggest customers with the best credit ratings, currently 5 percent, "may take place soon." "Under these circumstances," the letter was quoted as saying, "the Fed [Federal Reserve Board] could not hold the discount rate at 4 percent for long."

The letter noted that the Federal Reserve may want to hold off on any discount-rate move so as not to interfere with a series of Treasury borrowing operations which will run through next month.

In New York a weekly letter by Aubrey G. Lanston & Co., Inc., dealers in U.S. Government securities, noted that an increase in the discount rate "has been talked about for some weeks."

"We would not dare to predict that the discount rates of the Federal Reserve banks will not be raised either this month or next, although we think that the prospects for an increase are not exactly cut and dried," the Lanston letter commented.

The settlement of the steel labor dispute last week was at first considered inflationary and yields on Treasury bills climbed, the letter said. But later analyses indicated the cost of the settlement to the steel companies is about one-half of that experienced in previous postwar settlements, the letter added. "If true, the significance of the steel settlement to future Federal Reserve policy actions is less than was assumed in the market last Wednesday," the Lanston firm said.

The Lanston letter also suggested that rather than increasing the discount rate to bring it in line with other interest-rate levels, Federal Reserve authorities might consider becoming more selective about lending funds to member commercial banks at the so-called discount window.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DEROUNIAN (at the request of Mr. HALLECK), for an indefinite period, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. BAILEY (at the request of Mr. SLACK), on account of illness.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. HERLONG, for 10 minutes, today.

Mr. POWELL (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK), on tomorrow, for 1 hour.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. ALGER and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. JONAS and to include a speech.

Mr. PORTER and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. BOSCH (at the request of Mr. MOORE).

Mr. SCHENCK, to place in the RECORD an address made by Mr. ROBERTS before the annual meeting of the Royal Automobile Club of Canada last week.

Mr. HEALEY.

Mr. GARMATZ.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12:30 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 13, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1645. A letter from the Administrator, Veterans' Administration, transmitting the annual report of the activities of the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, pursuant to the provisions of 38 U.S.C. 214 (H. Doc. No. 248); to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

1646. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, dated August 14, 1959, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustration, on a survey of Little Pass, Clearwater Bay, Fla., authorized by the River and Harbor Act, approved March 2, 1945 (H. Doc. No. 293); to the Committee on Public Works and ordered to be printed with one illustration.

1647. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Bureau of Customs covering restoration of balances withdrawn from appropriation and fund accounts, pursuant to section 1(a)(2) of (70 Stat. 648) (31 U.S.C. 701(a)(2)); to the Committee on Government Operations.

1648. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of Commodity Credit Corporation activities of the Evanston (formerly Chicago) Commodity Office, Commodity Stabilization Service, Department of Agriculture, for the fiscal year 1958, pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 53 and 31 U.S.C. 67; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1649. A letter from the Administrator, Veterans' Administration, transmitting a report on the activities in the disposal of foreign excess property for the period January 1, 1959, through December 31, 1959, pursuant to title IV, section 404(d), the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1650. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting the annual report of operations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1959, pursuant to 20 Stat. 108; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1651. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend section 4248 of title 18, United States Code, relating to the termination of custody of mentally incompetent prisoners"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WALTER:

H.R. 9566. A bill for the relief of Fritz Lang; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9567. A bill for the relief of Wiktor Golik and Jozsef Kelemen; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Tribute to Hon. Isidore Dollinger

OF

HON. JAMES C. HEALEY

OF NEW YORK

Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the 2d session of the 86th Congress there is one colleague whose absence is especially felt by me. I refer to my very dear friend, Isidore Dollinger, who served New York's 23d Congressional District with distinction from the time of his election in 1948 until his recent resignation from Congress.

Isidore Dollinger will be deeply missed by all of his friends here in the House, but especially by those of us from New York who have been closely associated with him. He was very helpful to me when I first came to Congress and I am grateful for his friendship and our association in Congress. I consider it an honor to serve in his place on the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. He is respected and liked by all who know him and his fine record in public service and politics have earned him his new position as district attorney of Bronx County. I know he will continue to serve the people of the Bronx in the same capable way he did in the U.S. Congress.

I do not know of anyone who does not consider our new district attorney of the Bronx an outstanding and distinguished gentleman. It is my pleasure to join his many other friends in the House of Representatives in wishing him good luck and happiness.

Dictograph Products, Inc., Celebrates 50th Anniversary

OF
HON. ALBERT H. BOSCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, in November 1959, Dictograph Products, Inc., located in my congressional district, celebrated its 50th anniversary in the field of internal communications.

American business can give much of the credit for its rapid growth and highly efficient operating methods to the dramatic advances in the vital area of communications. A significant contribution to this area has been made by companies which have engineered electronic means of voice transmission to fit the varied and complicated needs of individual firms. One of the pioneers in this field is Dictograph Products, Inc.

On its 50th anniversary it received congratulations from U.S. Secretary of Commerce Frederick H. Mueller and was presented with a certificate of merit from the city of New York in honor of the occasion.

In tracing the history of Dictograph Products and its founder Dr. Miller Reese Hutchison we can see how American inventiveness built a company that in turn has aided and fostered the growth of hundreds of businesses, small and large, throughout the country.

When Dr. Hutchison perfected and commercially produced his dictograph internal communication system at the turn of the century it was the first of its type ever marketed. The philosophy behind the system is the same today as it was then. In short, the system aimed to supply to the management and operation of every business a means of two-way communication which would be fast, private and flexible enough to fit any organizational plan.

Recognizing its wide application companies such as Sears Roebuck, Pacific Gas & Electric, and Monsanto Chemical became early users of the system. In the 1920's Supreme Court Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes used the system to coordinate his tremendous volume of office work. As these companies and many like them expanded, their intercommunications expanded. Today Dictograph is used by 89 percent of America's leading companies, by more than 30,000 other successful companies and by military installations and Government agencies such as the Pentagon, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Atomic Energy Commission, and the Central Intelligence Agency.

But Dr. Hutchison did not confine himself to one area. He perfected other acoustical devices. The best known of these is the Acousticon hearing aid—the first commercially manufactured electrical hearing device. For this invention he received the Reward of Merit for Scientific Investigation and Invention from Queen Alexandra, of England. He received the medal because of the success of his acoustic appliance in aiding her hearing. Other medals and awards Dictograph has received include the Universal Exposition Medal, the Silver Medal at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, the famed Diplome Bruxelles Exposition Universelle et Internationale, the Grand Prix de Paris, and the Grand Prix Gold Medal Hors Concours.

Today, the company under the leadership of its president, Malte J. Carlson is devoting considerable time, effort, and money to research and further perfection of its products. In conjunction with its golden anniversary in the intercommunications field it introduced a new transistorized system which was heralded by newspapers throughout the country as a major step in humanizing internal communication.

It is fitting that we should focus attention on Dictograph Products, Inc., on completion of its 50th year in the intercommunication field and give recognition as well to its pioneering efforts and contributions in the development of devices to aid the hard of hearing. I am proud to join in paying tribute to this company.

Swastika Vandalism

OF
HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed in recent weeks renewed manifestations of that loathsome affliction called anti-Semitism. The news stories from large cities in the United States and in different parts of the world report acts of vandalism and desecration of Jewish homes, institutions, monuments, and places of worship. I regret to say that my own city of Baltimore is one of these cities.

West Germany, of course, has gotten the most attention, since the current rash of anti-Jewish activities seems to have broken out after two young hoodlums in Cologne defaced a synagog on Christmas Eve.

I trust that those who perpetuate these offenses will be dealt with promptly and sternly, and will be punished to the full extent of the law. Where the laws are inadequate, new laws should be enacted without delay.

The New York Times of Sunday, January 10, 1960, reports that Chancellor Adenauer will ask the Bundestag to amend the penal code with the aim of curbing anti-Semitic activities. The same newspaper also reports that a Labor Member of the British Parliament—Sir Leslie Plummer—is drafting a bill to impose jail sentences up to 6 months for painting swastikas on buildings.

The West German Government has a special obligation and responsibility to deal with this matter, for it must show to the world that the evil spirit of Hitlerism is not rising again from the dead ashes of World War II. I believe Chancellor Adenauer recognizes full well that if Germany fails to do its proper duty, it will forfeit the respect and confidence that the Federal Republic has gained in the free world for its hard work of postwar reconstruction, its contributions to NATO defenses, and its diligent effort to make amends to the surviving victims of Nazi persecution and tyranny.

There have been some attempts, in Germany and elsewhere, to discount the recent actions of racial vandalism as Communist maneuvers to discredit the Federal Republic of Germany and the Chancellor and thereby to serve Moscow's propaganda line in advance of the summit talks. While the Communists are quite capable of resorting to such techniques, so far there has been no real evidence of a Communist plot.

There are indications that the German youth has not been taught in school what the Hitler regime has done in its monstrous assault on humanity. The Federal Republic of Germany would do well, even at this late date, to reexamine its educational policies as well as its laws, in order to extirpate the Nazi influence from German life.

We in the United States need not be smug about the problem. There are many acts of violence and depredations against people and property in the United States caused by racial and religious animosities. We have our own hoodlums and delinquents who paint swastikas and burn crosses and even throw bombs. Sometimes the depredations are against Negroes, sometimes against Jews, Catholics, Protestants, or others. Religious bigotry and race hatred are malignant social diseases which can spread throughout the body politic unless they are treated skillfully and in time.

Many of the reports and news stories depict the offenders as juveniles engaging in a new kind of prank called swastika vandalism. Among those who play these ugly games we might expect to find crackpots, fanatics, professional agitators, psychopaths, and other emotionally disoriented persons. If youngsters are taking a fancy to this evil sport, then I fear that juvenile delinquency is assuming a form even more dangerous than street fights, robbery, and mayhem. For actions which associate youth with religious and racial prejudice strike at the very vitals of American life and freedom. America's future is dark indeed if its youngsters become infected with the virulence of religious and race hatred which has torn nations and continents apart and led to mass murder and frightful wars. We can ignore the crackpots and fanatics but we cannot ignore the youth of America.

Next month Americans will salute Brotherhood Week. I hope that the President of the United States will find time, in recognition of Brotherhood Week, to make a nationwide appeal to the American people to spur their efforts, individually and through their civic, religious, and local government institutions, to promote good will and understanding amongst all Americans. We owe it to ourselves, to our children, and to the future of the country to condemn the offenses to which I have referred and to hold up the offenders to national scorn and disgrace as betrayers of the free way of life.

Man of the South, 1959

OF
HON. CHARLES RAPER JONAS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, it is a high honor to wir the award as "Man of the South." This honor was bestowed upon one of my distinguished constituents, Mr. Norman A. Cocke, of Charlotte, N.C., chairman of the board of Duke Power Co., for outstanding accomplishments in 1959.

Mr. Cocke was presented his award at a banquet held at the Charlotte Country Club on December 14, 1959. The Honorable SAM J. ERVIN, JR., senior U.S. Senator from North Carolina, presented the award to Mr. Cocke.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am pleased to include the significant remarks of Senator ERVIN on that occasion:

ADDRESS BY HON. SAM J. ERVIN, JR., U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

Our friend has been chosen to receive this, the Man of the South for 1959, award by the vote of those who know the vast contributions which he has made to the industrial, educational and religious development of the Carolinas.

It is not often that one has an opportunity to express publicly his admiration and affection for a friend whom he has known for many years. Even though the task is simply that of presenting the award, I shall trespass upon your time for a few moments to say something concerning him whom we honor.

On an occasion such as this, we are conscious of the inadequacy of words. We long for the power to use what the poets have called the language of the heart. This is a silent language which finds its expression in deeds rather than words. You spoke the language of the heart when you laid aside your exacting labors and came to this meeting to manifest your love for him whom we honor.

I am compelled, however, to use mere words on this occasion. For this reason, I shall use words which come closest to the language of the heart—the words of a poet—to describe our friend. They are the words which are used by a great poet of free enterprise, Rudyard Kipling, to describe a great American. They are a fitting description of Norman A. Cocke:

"Leal servant, loved master,
Rare comrade, sure guide."

Mr. Whitaker, Mr. Sutton, Dr. Edens, the Reverend Mr. Blair, and Mr. Robertson have recounted to us in well-chosen words the vast contributions of Norman Cocke to the industrial, the educational, and the religious life of the Carolinas.

They have given eloquent expression to the fact that Norman Cocke has been a servant to the people of the Carolinas. I love the old Scotch adjective "leal," and apply it to Norman Cocke because he has certainly been at all times a true-hearted servant to our area.

During the course of his career, Norman Cocke has attained solely upon his own merit positions of high responsibility. For this reason, he can also be fittingly described in the words of the poet as a "master." In his capacity of "master," he has always applied to those subject to his authority the golden rule. As a consequence, all of those who have labored under his supervision join me in declaring that he is a "loved master."

Those of us who are privileged to enjoy Norman Cocke's friendship know that his great qualities of head and heart make him a rare comrade, and that his unerring integrity and sense of the rightness of things make him a sure guide.

This brings me to this question: What makes Norman Cocke a "leal" servant, a loved master, a rare comrade, a sure guide?

It seems to me that the answer to this question is crystal clear. Norman Cocke walks among us in simpleness, and gentleness, and honor.

I use the word "simpleness" to describe Norman Cocke's complete freedom from affectation, from artificiality, and from duplicity.

I do not use the word "gentleness" to imply that he lacks in any respect the characteristic of firmness in circumstances which call for the exercise of that characteristic. I use it to indicate the considerate and kindly attitude which arises out of his inborn love for people of all sorts.

Norman Cocke walks among us in honor because of his complete integrity of thought, word, and deed.

For these reasons, Norman Cocke was well chosen to be the Man of the South. It is my happy privilege to present to him at this time the physical symbol of his selection as such.

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, following is my newsletter of January 9, 1960:

WASHINGTON REPORT
(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

JANUARY 9, 1960.

"I, JOHN KYL, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I about to enter. So help me God."

Thus did the Speaker swear in the year's first new Member, JOHN KYL, of Iowa. Not only were all Members reminded of their oath taken a year earlier, but also of the relentless toll that time takes from the ranks of Congressmen. Since Congress adjourned, Representatives Boyle (Illinois), Carter (Iowa), Bush (Pennsylvania), and Senator Langer (North Dakota) have passed on. The total loss since the 86th Congress first convened in January of 1959 now is seven Representatives and one Senator. This saddening experience was heightened by the demise of Dick Simpson (Pennsylvania) Thursday morning. Dick, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Ways and Means, was a 22-year veteran of Congress. There was no question about the sincerity and depth of feeling of members of both parties paying tribute to his memory.

The reconvening of Congress January 6 was accompanied by a spontaneous and enthusiastic camaraderie as, milling about, Members exchanged greetings on the House floor. The Speaker's birthday the same day was the cause of even more good will as all united in wishing the best for Speaker RAYBURN. Earlier many Members had joined the President and Vice President at the traditional church service.

The President delivered the state of the Union message, as usual, before a joint session of the House and Senate in the House Thursday. Present also were Supreme Court Justices, the President's Cabinet officers, and the foreign ministers, including the Russian Ambassador. The smiling Mr. Menshikov looks surprisingly American in appearance and conduct. Vice President NIXON (President of the Senate) and House Speaker RAYBURN jointly presided. The Speaker introduced the President, who looked fit and happy.

The state of the Union message, 40 minutes long, covered a lot of ground, alternately dealing in generalities and then in specifics. The President spoke with unmistakable forcefulness and confidence. His two themes of peace and freedom struck just the right note, it seemed to me. Particularly pleasing was his stress of freedom, not only in the accepted sense as freedom from oppression between nations, but also as a domestic matter within our Nation, where legislation and the role of Federal Government can jeopardize our personal liberties, as we are forced to pay the tax price and suffer the bureaucratic control of Federal Government programs. For example, the President specifically reminded us that the growth problems of cities must be handled within the traditional balanced framework of Federal-State Government, not "yield to the deceptive bait of the easy Federal tax dollar." Equally satisfying was his emphasis on the need for Government living within its income, that is, a balanced budget. The big surprise of the day was his forecast of a $4.2 billion surplus which he recommended as payment against the national debt. Freedom and individual liberty took on new significance and meaning through this treatment of domestic matters. The Federal Government's legislative action obviously affects each individual's personal freedom—as viewed in specific programs mentioned by the President as warranting Congress' attention, such as labor-management relations, agriculture, education, civil rights, and finally in the inflation which may result from governmental action.

Peace, as freedom from aggression and oppression, received major attention. The President laid the responsibility for today's uneasiness squarely at Russia's door. Our efforts are directed to maintaining peace for ourselves and others, backed up by overpowering military strength. As the President put it, the Soviet threat could be competitive incentive to us, not a fear, with our system, not the Soviet's, offering the only worthwhile prize—freedom.

To accomplish our objectives, the President appealed for cooperation from Congress, noting that he has been politically opposed by Congress more than any other President. There was a significant lack of applause by Democrats throughout the speech. For my part, I thought the message excellent. However, it is necessary to receive the later, more detailed messages to understand his specific recommendations. The particular areas he mentioned briefly which need further explanation, as I see it, include foreign aid, labor-management relations, agriculture, aid to education, civil rights, and the International Court, all of which reminds me as it may you, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and we must all pay that price, certainly your Congressman.

My efforts to inform the people of their Government will include regular weekly television (WFAA–TV), Sunday, 10:30 a.m., weekly radio (KLIF), occasional daily radio reports, the weekly newsletter (available to all who want it), and the yearly questionnaire.

Let's Bring Social Security Up to Date

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, statistics tell us that 8.8 percent of our national population will be over 65 years of age this year. That percentage means 15,805,000 men and women.

In my State of Oregon the percentage of the population over 65 will be 9.2. Of a total of 1,863,000 persons, 172,000 will have passed their 65th birthdays.

These cold statistics concern human beings who have given generously and warmly of themselves. They have fought for democracy. They have helped pull our Nation from the depths of depression. They have unstintingly paid for improvements for all of us.

They have done more than their share. What have we done for them?

It is too easy to condemn the older citizen for not having saved enough money to retire. Well, how many of us have enough money to retire?

We forget that costs have jumped higher and higher. The adequate pension of the thirties and forties is hopelessly inadequate in the sixties, just as it was in the fifties. How much can the woman retiree at age 62 who receives $26.40 buy? How much can the man receiving the minimum retirement of $33 at age 65 purchase?

These questions should not have to be asked.

I believe there are inequities in the present social security laws. These laws are important and complex. It is vital that the system be operated on a sound and fair basis. The system must be under constant study. Here are some changes I believe should be made:

First. Elimination of minimum age for persons receiving disability insurance.

Second. End of discrimination in hiring and paying of persons because of age.

Third. Enactment of the Self-Employed Individuals Retirement Act of 1959 which passed the House March 16, 1959, and is now pending in the Senate.

Fourth. Removal of restrictions as to the amount of outside earnings a person receiving social security may have.

Fifth. Passage of the Forand bill for hospitalization for retirees.

Sixth. Increase in minimum social security payments at ages 65 and 62 which now are inadequate.

Seventh. Reexamination of the payment system under social security, bringing it up to date to meet current costs.

Throughout the country citizen groups are organizing to help improve existing conditions. In Oregon there are at least two such organizations.

I have never endorsed the program of any particular group. I do believe citizen groups can help point up inequities and can help the Congress write better legislation. I favor any steps through which citizens can inform themselves more fully and organize for political action.

I am concerned, however, when I receive letters such as was written to me last month by a constituent in Mapleton, Oreg. To set the record in order I am, under leave to extend my remarks, placing in the RECORD the communication from Mrs. Laura Atterberry, State secretary for the Social Security Clubs of Oregon, Inc., along with my reply to Mrs. Atterberry.

Changes in the existing law are needed. I am hopeful the Congress will be able to start making them this session.

The letters follow:

SOCIAL SECURITY CLUBS OF OREGON, INC.,
Mapleton, Oreg., December 14, 1959.

Hon. CHARLES PORTER.

DEAR SIR: The United Social Security, Inc., are going over the State showing letters supposedly written by yourself, WAYNE MORSE, and RICHARD NEUBERGER, endorsing their program to those who have a great deal of respect for your views.

——— ——— is now working the Florence area with copies of these letters, saying the original is with the president, Grover Slayter, at 1185 Chambers Street, in Eugene, Oreg.

We of the Social Security Clubs of Oregon, Inc., would like to know if you endorsed their program for $150 a month at age 62 and gave them permission to use it as they are really making money off our elderly people by getting them to join up at $10 a year membership for the first year, dues are not yet set for 1960, but their bill according to the letters are to get real consideration from our Oregon lawmakers in 1960.

——— ——— told, and we have it in writing also, an agent selling memberships receive $4 for from 1 to 10 memberships in a week, from 10 to 20, $4.50 each, and from 20 on they receive $5 each, ——— ——— told sold over 600 memberships in the month of November, we know the older people join because of the letters shown them as well as they are supposed to have a Washington, D.C., office.

Our organization, the Social Security Clubs of Oregon, Inc., would like to know if they have such letters from our Oregon lawmakers or if they have the right to use your good name among our voters to rob our old folks of $10 they cannot afford. Would you send me an article with your written permission to have it published in the Register-Guard and Siuslaw Oar on this matter.

Mr. PORTER, please have this stopped if untrue, for your sake and that of our elderly people, we need a more adequate social security, but not at the expense of our people who need every dime they now receive. I have worked with trying to get better benefits for our aged people for several years. I've yet to receive a dime for my services, our dues are $2 a year and we do not show letters from important people to receive the several hundred members we do have.

The United Social Security, Inc., is advertised as a nonprofit organization but the president gets a wage and each agent receives his commission, is that nonprofit? Please let me hear from you on this matter.

Respectfully yours,
LAURA ATTERBERRY,
State Secretary for Social Security Clubs of Oregon, Inc.

JANUARY 13, 1960.

Mrs. LAURA ATTERBERRY,
State Secretary, Social Security Clubs of Oregon, Inc., Mapleton, Oreg.

DEAR MRS. ATTERBERRY: Thank you for your recent letter relative to the United Social Security, Inc.

I have talked with members of the Social Security Clubs of America, Inc., and with members of the United Social Security Organization, Inc., which I believe you referred to in your letter. As you know, I am doing all within my power to correct existing inequities in the social security laws.

These laws are important and complex. It is vital that the system be operated on a sound and fair basis. It must be under constant study. Here are changes I believe should be made:

1. Elimination of minimum age for persons receiving disability insurance.
2. End of discrimination in hiring and paying of persons because of age.
3. Enactment of my Self-Employed Individuals Retirement Act of 1959, which passed the House March 16, 1959.
4. Removal of restrictions as to amount of outside earnings a person receiving social security may have.
5. Passage of the Forand bill for hospitalization for retirees.
6. Increase in minimum social security payments at ages 65 and 62, which now are inadequate.
7. Reexamination of the payment system under social security, bringing it up to date to meet current costs.

You mention in your letter that a campaign is under way to sell memberships in one organization and that my name is being used to endorse the program of this group. I have never endorsed the program of any particular group.

Citizen groups can help point up inequities and can help the Congress write better legislation. I favor any steps through which citizens can inform themselves more fully and organize for political action. Please let me know whenever I can be of any assistance.

Sincerely,
CHARLES O. PORTER,
Member of Congress.

Government's Role in Highway Safety

OF
HON. PAUL F. SCHENCK
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 12, 1960

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, on January 7, 1960, our colleague and chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBERTS], delivered an address at the annual meeting of the Royal Automobile Club of Canada, held this year in Montreal.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to insert this address so every Member can better understand the role of government in promoting highway safety:

GOVERNMENT'S ROLE IN HIGHWAY SAFETY

You have honored me by your kind invitation to meet with this distinguished group to discuss one of the most important problems facing your country and mine.

For, in my judgment, we cannot overestimate the importance of this problem of highway safety which we face today. Meetings such as this are of great significance because this is a problem that we, as individuals, can do something about. Too many of our space-age problems seem, at least, to be beyond our reach as we go about the routine of our daily lives.

But not so this problem of traffic safety. Here is a problem that, in a manner of speaking, is on our own front doorsteps, crying out for attention.

Not that we as individuals can solve the problem. Not that the problem can ever be completely solved. But we all can help to reduce the appalling toll of life and limb being taken daily in traffic accidents.

I do not pretend to be familiar with your problem here in Canada but I understand that in many respects that our problems are similar. I do know that the two countries are working together closely. I am told that 3,104 lives were lost in traffic accidents in Canada in 1958. In the United States, between 38,000 and 39,000 are being killed each year.

Canada can ill afford to lose 3,000 citizens a year. The United States can ill afford to lose 39,000 a year, especially when you remember that nearly half of them are being cut down at the very crest of their productive years, in the age bracket between 15 and 44.

I don't want to leave the impression that we have made no progress. The fact that during the last 15 years our fatality rate in the United States has held between 35,000 and 40,000 a year, in spite of the greatly increased mileage driven means that the rate per vehicle-mile has gone down. But a look at the accident statistics shows no cause for complacency. There is much that can and should be done.

The emphasis being placed on safety in this annual meeting is proof you see of the need for action to reduce the traffic toll.

If, by reviewing briefly some of the findings of the congressional subcommittee of which I am chairman, I can throw some light on this problem of ours, it will be the source of much satisfaction to me.

For this is your problem as well as mine. This problem of traffic safety is one that concerns us all. For each of us will have to contribute to the solution of the problem before we get very far in our efforts to reduce this appalling slaughter. It is not enough that we become better drivers. We must give our encouragement and support to those who seek and apply the necessary remedies. That support is going to cost us money. This support may mean a certain curtailment of some of our freedom of action. It may mean that some of those who enjoy driving may have to give up driving. It may mean sending some wornout and unsafe cars to the junk pile. It may mean putting a little less pressure on the accelerator, especially in heavy traffic.

I don't want to bore you with statistics. You are all familiar enough with the facts and figures to know this is a serious problem.

Just for the sake of emphasis let me outline briefly some of the facts brought out in the hearings held by my subcommittee.

These facts are a warning and a challenge to every one of us. And by us, I don't mean those working on this problem. I mean everyone who drives an automobile, or rides in one, or walks across the road here in Canada, or in the United States, or anyplace, anywhere that automobiles are operated.

You don't have to be a driver to be concerned. The toll of pedestrians killed or injured in the United States is appalling.

The problem for the pedestrian is worldwide. I am reminded of a remark made by the late Fred Allen after a visit to Paris. He said that one reason there is a church on almost every corner in Paris is so that the pedestrians can go in and pray before trying to cross the street.

But let me outline briefly the situation in the United States.

Accidents of all types, including traffic accidents, are the third leading cause of death in the United States, being exceeded only by cancer and diseases of the heart and circulatory system.

We are justified in referring to traffic accidents as a major public health problem in the United States.

The death toll from cancer and heart trouble is the cause of much concern, and justifiably so. But the auto traffic death toll is more heartbreaking. Deaths from cancer and heart disease generally occur in the later decades of life. Traffic deaths are striking down the youth of the land who are just entering their productive years.

Of all the young men aged 15 to 24 who died in the United States in 1957, 40 percent died in motor vehicle accidents. One-fourth of the fatalities among young women in the same age bracket resulted from traffic accidents.

As stated earlier, in the United States we are killing around 39,000 people a year in traffic accidents.

Startling as that figure is, it gives only part of the story. That is the dramatic, headline-making part of the story. But behind and beyond is tragedy multiplied many thousandfold in maimed and broken bodies, in families denied the services of a bread winner—sometimes for months, sometimes for life.

In 1957, the best estimate the subcommittee could get from private sources on the number of traffic accident injuries was 1,400,000.

Then, on recommendation of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Congress directed the U.S. Public Health Service to make certain statistical studies. That study revealed that the true figure on traffic injuries was nearer 5 million persons, nearly four times the private estimate.

Five million injuries means 25 million days in bed in hospital or home. It means 125 persons injured for each person killed.

Half of those hospitalized for accidents in the United States are traffic victims.

Besides the loss of life and the 5 million injuries, there is a staggering property loss, important in striking a balance when we consider the cost of the measures needed to reduce the traffic toll.

In the United States, the property loss from auto accidents amounts to between 5 and 7 billion dollars a year. In addition the cost of auto liability insurance runs to $3 billion a year, or more.

In a report prepared for Congress last year, the U.S. Department of Commerce estimated that traffic accidents cost $116 for each registered vehicle, which averages 1 cent for each mile driven, or roughly 12½ cents for each gallon of gasoline consumed.

We had warm debates in Congress last year over increasing the gasoline tax to help finance the National Highway System.

Yet, we pay scant attention to this 12.5-cent-a-gallon toll levied by highway accidents. That is worse than a tax. At least, we are getting roads and other benefits from the tax. We are getting nothing but heartaches and shrunken bank accounts from the accidents.

Now, anyone who came along with a proposal that would reduce our gasoline tax even half a cent a gallon would get a respectful hearing.

I think it is possible, if we work together and are willing to make the necessary adjustments, that we can reduce this auto accident levy a lot more than a half a cent for each gallon of gasoline we burn.

Now, I don't believe you are going to improve the situation much merely by asking motorists to stop killing and maiming one another.

We are not going to stop this needless slaughter with slogans. Lectures are not enough. Good intentions are not enough.

Unfortunately, we cannot prevent all accidents. We must accept that.

We can prevent some of the injuries and many of the deaths without preventing the accidents. One way to do this is to give the public safer motor vehicles. During the last session of Congress, I got a bill through the House that will help give us safer vehicles. In a moment, I want to go into more detail on that but now I want to digress a moment to discuss some of the things my subcommittee has discovered regarding this problem of highway safety.

This problem has concerned us in the United States a long time. Back in World War I, we drafted a code of rules for the road.

In 1924 we organized a cooperative movement to promote safety. That was headed by Herbert Hoover, later President. That first conference urged the adoption of uniform traffic regulations. A committee was appointed to draft a model code. In 1926 a model code was approved by a national conference. A model traffic ordinance was drafted in 1928.

No one doubts the importance of a uniform code in reducing traffic accidents in a country as vast as the United States, with people moving rapidly from one jurisdiction to another by the thousands daily.

But, after all these years, we are still trying to get the uniform traffic code adopted.

It is apparent that persuasion is not enough. Something more than logic is needed.

In 1956, in the face of the mounting traffic accident toll, I became convinced that the time had come for the Federal Government to take a hand, if to do nothing more than to outline the problem and suggest steps to improve the situation.

Accordingly, I presented a resolution calling for a congressional investigation.

As a result, I was appoined chairman of the Special Subcommittee on Traffic Safety. Immediately we set to work to learn what we could about traffic safety. We heard leading experts in the safety field. We visited manufacturing plants. We talked with industry safety engineers. We met with medical men whose gruesome job it is to try to save as many of the accident victims as possible. We talked with law enforcement officers who try to prevent accidents.

We came up with certain recommendations. The efforts of 3 active years are included in the subcommittee reports presented to Congress and which have had a wide distribution among people working in the traffic safety field.

We have urged more aggressive action by local communities and the States in carrying out certain basic recommendations of the President's Highway Safety Conference. We urge expanded research into the cause of accidents. We urge the States to adopt the uniform traffic code. We urge that driver examining and licensing procedures be strengthened.

We urged the industry to drop emphasis on speed and horsepower and concentrate on building safer vehicles. They stopped advertising speed and horsepower but kept right on building bigger and more powerful automobiles until the buying public, by turning in increasing numbers to the smaller domestic and foreign models, forced the Big Three to take a second look.

Our recommendations regarding research are important, in my judgment. We need to know where we have been and where we are going and how best to get there.

Already I have pointed out the inadequacy of the accident statistics available to our subcommittee in 1957. The figures we were given were merely guesses, and not very good guesses at that.

In large and important areas we still are guessing. Research costs money. For some reason, perhaps because of our fatalistic attitude toward auto accidents in general, it has been difficult to get money needed for research.

We were told, for example, that the auto industry has been spending about $5 or $6 million a year on research. All the smugness was taken away from that statement, however, when it was pointed out that this is only a very small drop in a very big bucket when you remember that the industry is selling around $11 billion worth of new automobiles each year.

Last year the U.S. Public Health Service spent $1 million in doing research on all accidents, even though accidents are the third leading cause of death in the United States. That amounts to about $2.50 for each traffic death. On the other hand, we have been spending $40,000 a year on research for each polio death. For each cancer death, we are spending around $360 a year. For each death from heart disease, we are spending around $87 a year on research.

As a result of our subcommittee study, last September I introduced a bill in Congress to establish a National Accident Prevention Center to concentrate upon this important public health problem.

Previously I had introduced a bill to provide Federal aid for driver training. No one questions the importance of proper driver education in reducting the accident toll, especially among our younger drivers. Yet only 16 States provide State aid for driver education programs. It is my belief that a little aid from the Federal Government will encourage the States to establish programs which will far more than pay their way in reducing accidents. Here, in my judgment, is one sure and easy way to reduce this 12.5-cent-a-gallon levy from accidents.

Earlier I mentioned my bill to promote the manufacture of safer vehicles to reduce deaths and injuries. That bill would require that all passenger-carrying motor vehicles purchased by the Federal Government must meet certain minimum safety standards set by the Secretary of Commerce. It is my belief that this would result in the production of better automobiles for the public by forcing the manufacturers to adopt as standard, or perhaps optional equipment, the safety features required by the Federal Government. The bill was bitterly opposed on the floor of the House on the grounds that it would increase the cost of motor vehicles bought by the Government.

My answer to that is that the cost of these essential safety features largely could be absorbed by eliminating some of the chrome and frills which serve no useful purpose. Even if the safer vehicles cost more money, we can, in the long run, save money by reducing that 12.5-cent accident toll levy.

My subcommittee has favorably reported and the House has passed another important bill. This would require the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to make a study of the effect of automobile exhaust gases on human health and report to Congress within 2 years, with recommendations, if any, regarding steps necessary to protect the public health. Legislation to attack the exhaust problem is sponsored by my colleague from Ohio, the Honorable PAUL SCHENCK, the ranking Republican member on the subcommittee. I mention this to show that there are no party politics in the subcommittee's efforts to reduce the auto accident toll.

There is a growing feeling that auto exhaust gases, in addition to contributing to the dreaded smog which is an increasing menace to urban areas in the United States, is a serious health menace and perhaps an important contributor to certain types of motor vehicle accidents.

It was with the greatest reluctance that I came to the conclusion that we need the legislation mentioned, and other measures.

I am from the South, an area where we cherish the time-honored Anglo-Saxon concept of the importance of protecting the rights and liberties of the individual from arbitrary and capricious government. We have held to and defended that concept of freedom from arbitrary rule for many generations.

We follow the doctrine of State rights. Essentially that means local self-government. It means government by the people for the benefit of the people concerned. It means protection of the rights of the individual to enjoy life and the fruits of his labor as long as he does not interfere with the rights of his neighbor. It means freedom from arbitrary rule, imposed by an absent bureaucracy with little or no knowledge of local conditions.

But absence of government does not mean freedom. It means anarchy.

As a nation we abhor regulation. In view of our similar backgrounds I am sure the same is true here. We resort to legislation only as a last resort. We like to see things done voluntarily.

We want those who have responsibility to use it. The States and local communities, by legislative action, could accomplish many of the things that must be done if we are going to reduce the traffic toll. They could pass legislation to require higher safety standards for vehicles sold within their borders. In fact, the Secretary of Commerce in his report to Congress last year, recommended that the States do this. The point is that in view of the record can we afford to wait for the States to do this?

As pointed out a while ago, with convincing arguments to back up our case, for more than 30 years we have been trying to get a uniform traffic code adopted by the various States. Some progress has been made, but we have a long way to go.

Now, I am not advocating that Congress impose by law a uniform traffic code on vehicles moving in interstate commerce. But there are certain things the Federal Government is going to have to do if we are going to make much progress in the near future.

The Federal Government must help the States with driver education programs. We must do more in the field of research. We must promote the production of safer vehicles by requiring that passenger-carrying motor vehicles purchased by the Government meet certain safety standards.

It may be that we shall have to go further than that in enacting Federal legislation.

My point is that if we are going to get the job done, we cannot self-righteously hide behind the cloak of State rights, or reject steps which are going to cost money. If we are going to reduce that 12.5-cent-a-gallon levy we may have to add a few cents to our tax bill. We will have to buy a little more research. We may have to pay a few dollars for safety devices. We may have to hire more traffic patrolmen and pay them better salaries. We may have to spend a few dollars in keeping our cars in repair. Some of those now driving may have to stop driving. After all, driving is a privilege and not a right. No one who endangers the life and property of his neighbor has a right to drive.

I don't think you can catch every drunk driver before he wrecks himself or someone else. But, with proper enforcement, we can keep a lot of drunk drivers off the roads.

I don't think you are going to stop drivers from going to sleep just by passing laws.

There always will be careless and thoughtless people behind steering wheels.

Adequate vehicle inspections will keep many unsafe vehicles off the roads.

Still there will be accidents. We can't stop all these accidents but, as I said a moment ago, we can reduce the number of deaths and injuries without stopping the accidents.

How? By giving the driver and his passengers a safer package in which to ride. We need safer automobiles. Reluctantly, I am convinced that the quickest way to get these safer automobiles is by legislation.

That is not my opinion alone. It is supported by leading specialists who have worked in this field. Its soundness is shown by the studies made by the crash injury research project of Cornell University under the able direction of John Moore, who is well known to many of you in this audience.

My position is supported by the American Medical Association, which has gone on record in support of legislative action in this field. The association presented the subcommittee an impressive list of essential safety features our doctors would like to see built into our automobiles.

My position that safer cars will cut the traffic toll was supported by leading engineers and safety experts who appeared before the subcommittee, including such well-known figures as Dr. T. P. Wright, the distinguished vice president for research of Cornell University, and formerly head of the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

To get legislative action, we must have public support. The public must be convinced of the need before they will support legislation to tighten up on driver licensing procedures, to require adequate motor vehicle inspections, to spend tax money on driver education and research, to tell the industry they must build safer vehicles which meet certain minimum safety standards.

As I said before, as a Nation we abhor regulation. We don't like taxes. What is true in the United States likewise is true in Canada, I am sure.

But we have to think of those 39,000 people dead upon our streets and roads. We have to think of the millions of injured.

And, if we want to stop to consider the cost, we must think of that 12.5-cent a gallon levy we pay because of these accidents.

In conclusion, let me summarize briefly the major things I think we must do, and soon, to reduce the traffic toll.

1. We must have legislation to establish minimum safety standards for passenger-carrying motor vehicles bought for Government use.

2. More emphasis must be placed on driver education, both to combat lawlessness which contributes to juvenile delinquency, and to reduce the accident toll in the age bracket where casualties are heaviest.

3. We must continue to urge the adoption of uniform driving rules to apply from coast to coast in both our countries to eliminate dangerous confusion and to plug loopholes contributing to the accident toll.

4. We must spend more on research. Only by research have we made substantial progress against epidemics and mass killers in the public health field and here we are dealing with one of the major public health problems of our time.

Again, let me thank you for your kind invitation to meet with you. My very best thanks go to all of you for your kind hospitality.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, in a world so greatly engrossed in the pursuit of material goals and so largely under the tyranny of things, we would keep clear the path to a hallowed temple of the spirit where, in all our concern for the Nation and the world, we bow in humility and reverence, guarding with unceasing vigil the sacred flame of faith, and hope, and love on the altar of the unseen and eternal.

Give us to know with a solemnity that awes our spirits that if a nation values anything more than freedom under God, it will lose its freedom; and that if it is comfort or luxuries, security or money, that it values more, in the long run it will also lose them. So, in this day of contending values gird us at any sacrifice to incarnate and exemplify the faith we proclaim and to be ever loyal to the deathless principles for which even the stars in their courses fight. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

STROM THURMOND, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 11, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

DISCLOSURE OF FINANCE CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH EXTENSIONS OF CREDIT—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BILL TO LIE ON THE DESK

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2755) to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit, introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], lie on the desk for the remainder of the session today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of routine business; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY SENATOR GREEN OF RHODE ISLAND NOT TO SEEK REELECTION TO THE SENATE

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, out of the city of Providence last Monday night there came an announcement that reached into every nook and corner of our State of Rhode Island with a note of regret and a richness of recollection.

I am sure the same sentiments are aroused in all of us in the Senate today.

The announcement was by my colleague, U.S. Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, that he will not run for reelection.

It was as though a curtain were being drawn across a great chapter in the history of Rhode Island—yes, and our country's history—by the hand of the only man who could and would make that decision.

The name of THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has been inseparable from the fortunes of the Democratic Party in the State of Rhode Island for all the years of this century.

If I seem to speak in a political vein, it is with no sense of partisanship, but merely to record the clear history of our times.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN was a Democrat when it was not traditional for a person of his wealth and position to enlist in the then minority party of Rhode Island. But it was consonant with his principles.

No man did more than he to make it the majority party.

Twenty-eight years ago he led his party to power in the State of Rhode Island as Governor. As Governor, he brought a fresh point of view—human and modern—to State government.

For 24 years he has graced this floor as a Senator from Rhode Island. These Halls have been abundant witness to his statesmanship in these critical decades of our Nation's dangers and destiny.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN rose to the heights of dedicated service and personal sacrifice when, last year, he surrendered the prestige and power of the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

He did this in order that his temporary physical handicaps might not impede full progress in a year critical in our international responsibilities.

On Monday night my colleague took another noble step—the voluntary surrender of his assured return for another 6 years in this Senate. This is the Senate that he loves. It is a Senate that loves him, as his associates have demonstrated on more than one occasion.

He has surrendered the rigors of a campaign—the call of the hustings to which he was always delighted to respond—and the thrill of victory which has been his constant reward.

What nights of victory they were—1954—1948—1942—1936—1934—1932.

How those dates, decisions, and issues stir the hearts of all of us.

It has been my good fortune to have shared many of these nights of victory with him and to witness the happy hysteria of the milling crowds, cheering to the echo the ever greater victories of their beloved THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

If there seems a touch of loneliness in the contrast between the crowds cheering a victory and the solitude of sacrifice, let no one misunderstand.

Today the hearts of all Rhode Island are with their neighbor, our colleague. Party lines have never stood against him as a candidate. Party lines melt into one glad acclaim for him as a citizen.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is a man who gives and commands loyalty. Here in the Senate Senators have made their own assessment of his abilities by the honors and responsibilities they have placed upon him.

For him no task was too intricate, no journey too arduous, in fulfilling his obligations. He made himself familiar to and familiar with the far corners of our earth in order the better to discharge his duties.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN never ceased to be the student. He never ceased to be the servant of every good cause, educational, social, philanthropic.

In law, banking and business he lent the wisdom of his experience and the depths of his logic which we have often seen exercised here. Even the most modest account of his life sets something of a record in our official directory. This is altogether fitting his 92 years and his generous investment of them in public service.

Brown University—the school of his heart—continuously and continually honors him; and thus sets the pattern of recognition by all the facets of Rhode Island community existence in which Senator GREEN is a factor and a fixture.

I am sure that the announcement is not a signal of retirement from all this community responsibility.

There is no complete leisure for a man of his loyalties.

It is my hope that Senator GREEN may find time to record for posterity something of the personal history of his times. It will be an invaluable part of the Rhode Island and American record.

It will be an invitation to imitate; it will be a challenge to emulate the achievements of a great American.

As a living document it would continue to be an inspiration to those who had no opportunity to be close to him in the ever-growing years of his ever-expanding life.

This closeness has been the proud privilege of his colleagues of the Senate.

I know Senators join me in this prayer—

May God grant many more years of health, happiness and helpfulness to our beloved colleague—THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe that all of us felt a sense of loss when we learned of the decision of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] to retire from the Senate at the end of this term.

No Member of this body has ever been held in greater affection by his colleagues than has THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, and no man has ever given more selflessly of great talents and great patriotism to his country.

The outstanding characteristic of THEODORE GREEN is that he is a kindly man who always has a desire to help others. I shall never forget how helpful he was to me, when I was a freshman Senator, in guiding my footsteps along paths of prudence.

THEODORE GREEN may retire from the Senate, but I know that in a real sense he never will leave the Senate. I believe his genial spirit and his sense of courtesy and fairness and justice will always dominate these Halls, and his friends will always be with him in heart wherever he may go.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I wish to join the majority leader in his salute and tribute to our very distinguished friend and colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN].

Let me say to the majority leader that I have always regarded Senator GREEN as certainly one of the most gracious individuals I have ever encountered in my life. He has been gracious on every occasion, both early and late, no matter what the circumstance, no matter what the provocation. Along with that, he has preserved great acuity and interest, which are indeed notable characteristics.

How richly we have been blessed and how this body has been enriched by his continued presence here. I value and esteem his friendship. May his days continue in great abundance, and may the new year bring him its choicest blessings.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I desire to join in the tributes which have been voiced on the Senate floor to that grand American, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island.

Franklin D. Roosevelt once said that it mattered not whether a man was old in years if he were young in heart, because that is what really counts. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is young in heart. In fact, he is far more progressive and more enlightened than many who are barely half his age.

I consider it a great privilege to be able to salute THEODORE F. GREEN in person here today and to express my great admiration for his distinguished career. I wish him all possible happiness in the years ahead.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I wish to add a brief and perhaps more personal word regarding the retirement of our colleague from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

I knew him first when he was Governor of Rhode Island. Following that, I knew him when he was a U.S. Senator, at the time when I was Governor of Massachusetts.

I have had many associations with him, through mutual friendships, and many occasions social in character. I have always found him to be an able and interesting conversationalist. I have always felt that if I gave him a little "dig" of a personal character or affecting his State of Rhode Island, I would get back an even better one. He has never failed me as the years have gone by.

I look forward to many more opportunities of friendly association and discussion with him. I shall miss Senator GREEN when he leaves this body, where he has been a very distinguished and honorable Member for many years.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished Senators who have paid their tributes to our comrade of many years, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

I served with Senator GREEN on the Foreign Relations Committee when he was its chairman. He always was a most courteous and level-headed presiding officer, and he did an extremely fine job.

I became acquainted with him many, many years ago, when he and I traveled far into the West to attend the funeral of a Senator. On our return on the train, I first became acquainted with this distinguished citizen of Rhode Island. Since that time there has been a close tie of friendship and understanding between us.

Of course, I realize that when this year has ended, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN will no longer be a Senator in active service. But he will always be a Senator in another sense, and we shall always be glad to see him.

So I join with the other Senators who have spoken in paying the highest of compliments to Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is a remarkable combination of many virtues: ability, integrity, love of fellow man, sense of humor. I know of nothing I could say uncomplimentary about the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, even if I were sorely pressed to do so. He is beloved by all his colleagues.

When we repair to the little room where only Democratic Senators have lunch, the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island has a chair at the head of the table. Many a time I and others have gathered around, to partake of his wisdom, to enjoy his mirth and fellowship.

As a Member of the U.S. Senate, he has provided vigorous and progressive leadership. He has demonstrated wisdom. He has been foresighted. He has been compassionate and understanding. Never once have I heard an ill-tempered word from him; on the contrary, always he addresses himself to the merits of an issue, and does so with a vision far greater than most of us are privileged to have.

I regret that Senator GREEN is to leave the Senate. We shall miss him greatly. We wish him Godspeed. Wherever he goes, he will take with him the love, the affection, and the best wishes of all his colleagues.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as a very recently elected Member of the Senate, I wish to join in the kind and very true words which have been spoken by my senior colleagues with respect to the services of our good friend, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], who has treated this new Member of the Senate with consistent courtesy, and has proffered the hand of friendship, and has guided me on many matters of important policy. His departure from the Senate will be a real personal loss to me.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to join my colleagues in paying tribute to my genial neighbor from Rhode Island, Senator GREEN. It was with much regret that I noted he did not intend to run again for office as a Senator of the United States.

To all Senators he has been an example of real durability. I think there is no precedent in the history of the Senate for service such as his, since he was originally elected at the age of 70, and is retiring some 22 or 23 years later.

I certainly congratulate him upon his remarkable accomplishments, and on his outstanding service to his State and his country; and I wish him the best of good health and happiness in the years to come, which I hope may see him attain the age of 100.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I should like to add my voice to the voices of those paying tribute to the senior Senator from Rhode Island. As one of the most junior Members of this body, I think I can offer an observation to one of the most senior Members that comes from experience as well as from the heart; that is, as one newly arriving in the Senate, looking for new ideas and for inspiration, the junior Senator from Wyoming found them in the person of the senior Senator from Rhode Island. I want him to know what his young ideas have meant to a relatively young Member of this body. I pay my very deepest respects to him for his inestimable service in the Senate.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, as a Senator from a New England State and as a neighbor of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, I wish to add my voice to the voices of my colleagues in expressing my appreciation, respect, and affectionate regard for our beloved colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to join my colleagues in wishing good health and happiness to our friend and colleague, Senator GREEN, of Rhode Island.

To his colleagues in the Senate he is a joy and an inspiration. His example is an indication that there must be something about the air in this Chamber which gives men a zest for living and enjoyment in dealing with the Nation's problems, if they but know how to deal with them. The Senator from Rhode Island knows how to do it. I congratulate him for his honored presence in this Chamber for so many years.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I should like to join with my colleagues in conveying best wishes to Rhode Island's first citizen, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

The newspaper article which I read stated that Senator GREEN would not be a candidate for reelection this year and that his decision was reached because he felt that his health would not permit him to serve another 6-year term. For a brief time last evening I was inclined to agree with that account, because when I was driving home I saw Senator GREEN standing on a loading platform, waiting to take a street car to his place of residence, instead of walking, as he usually does. But upon reflection, I was willing to excuse him because it was then almost 7 o'clock in the evening, and I knew personally that he had started his working day very early.

Seriously, these Legislative Halls, Rhode Island, and the Nation have profited by the fact that when THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, who was born 92 years ago, reached manhood, he decided to place his talents, energy, and ability at the disposal of the people of his State, and then of the people of the Nation.

During his service at home in Rhode Island and during his service here, he has made, as all of us so well know, a magnificent contribution to the public welfare.

I, too, wish him many more years, each of them happy and rewarding.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, it was with great regret that I read the news stories yesterday of the decision of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], chairman emeritus of the Committee on Foreign Relations, not to seek reelection to the Senate when his term expires this year. I had hoped and expected that he would stay with us until he reached 100 years of age. I thought that was the general understanding of all his colleagues. But he has changed his mind.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN is, I believe, the only man in the history of the U.S. Senate to have been honored with the title of chairman emeritus, following his retirement as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Except for the interlude of the 80th Congress in 1947–48, Senator GREEN has served on the Foreign Relations Committee since a few months after he entered the Senate in 1937. He and I have served together for the last 10 years, and it was my difficult task to succeed him as chairman last year, when, despite the unanimous protests of members of the committee, he sought relief from that exacting assignment.

When Senator GREEN retired as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee last year, he lost not one whit of his interest in the committee or his devotion to its work. I have a particular personal debt to him for his great assistance to me and for his never-failing readiness to relieve me in presiding over the committee and to undertake any assignments which were appropriate to the occasion.

Senator GREEN has brought to the work of the Foreign Relations Committee the wisdom which comes only from long experience, the knowledge which comes only from personal acquaintance with most of the world's statesmen, and the courage of his convictions. All of these things he has combined with a gentle yet penetrating humor which on many occasions has illuminated an issue at the same time that it has enlivened a tedious meeting.

As all of us know, Senator GREEN has traveled widely throughout the world. In fact, I believe he has traveled far more than has any other Member of the Senate, and he probably knows more of the leading citizens of the world than does any other Senator.

Senator GREEN has indefatigably sought to find out for himself. If there is any aspect of human affairs in which he is not interested, I do not know what it is. He is equally at home poking into archeological ruins in the jungles of Cambodia or discussing world politics in a European chancellory.

He has likewise been equally at home and equally successful as a college professor, as a lawyer, as a businessman, as a politician, and as an amateur wrestler.

I am sure I speak for all of my colleagues on the committee when I say we will miss Senator GREEN very much, next year; and we look forward with interest to learning which career he will choose to pursue next. Whatever it is, I am sure it will be a great success. He will take with him our wishes for every happiness.

Mr. President, I anticipate a very busy session this year, and I look forward to Senator GREEN's active assistance and participation in the work of the committee during the remainder of this Congress.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I wish to join with the other Senators who today have spoken on the subject of the retirement from this body of our beloved colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN].

I first heard about Senator GREEN's proposed retirement over the radio, the night before last. Actually, I could hardly believe that news. In fact, when I saw Senator GREEN yesterday morning, I told him that I felt that he had let me down, because 5 years ago, immediately following his last election, he had told me that he intended to serve in the Senate until he was 100 years of age; and I remember that at that time he said, "The only thing that disturbs me about doing so is that in order to serve that long, I shall have to run for election twice more, because when I finish my next term, I will be only 99."

On yesterday, I said to him that I had told many groups about that statement by him, and I had added to it, "And I will be willing to wager that he will be there, too." But now he is taking himself away.

I wish to say that one of the highlights in my service in the Congress of the United States has been the privilege of enjoying the friendship and the fellowship of this wonderful man.

Since he retired from the active chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee—in fact, Mr. President, I do not quite know what that really means, because even as chairman emeritus of the committee, he has been about as active as he was when he was the chairman of the committee—but since he has given up the responsibility of the active chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee, it has been my privilege to sit by him in the committee. I have enjoyed my service with him in the committee and here on the floor of the Senate, during the years I have had that privilege. And, of course, I have especially enjoyed also the privilege of his friendship.

Mr. President, there are very many other fine things that can be said about this very estimable gentleman. After all, a great many things add up the total of the wonderful, genial companion and man that Senator GREEN is.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has referred to Senator GREEN'S travels. He has traveled to many parts of the world; and some of us have had the privilege of traveling with him, as I have done. I remember that in 1951, nine members of the Foreign Relations Committee, under his chairmanship—at that time he was the senior member of the committee who took the trip, although he was not then the committee chairman—went to Europe, where we visited several of the NATO countries, and held hearings and made a study, over a protracted period of time. I had heard a great deal about Senator GREEN'S stamina on trips, and I saw it manifested then. Many of us thought we were young fellows; but many a time we would seek the opportunity to take a midafternoon rest, during the heat of the day in some of those countries. But not so Senator GREEN. He was always ready and on the go.

I remember that on one occasion, when we were in the city of Athens, the weather was very warm. We had lunch that day at a yacht club; and after the lunch, we were told that it might be well for us to return to our hotels and rest during the hot part of the day, and then late in the afternoon go to the Acropolis. Most of us took that advice. But did Senator GREEN? No, Mr. President; quite the contrary. Later, when I talked with a young Foreign Service official who was accompanying Senator GREEN, he told me that Senator GREEN almost worked him to death. First of all, when returning to the city, the road led along a beautiful stretch of water; and Senator GREEN stopped there and took a swim. Then, while the others of us were resting in the cool of the hotel, Senator GREEN was out in the city, visiting some of the excavations of the ancient ruins, studying archeology.

In the late afternoon we went to the Acropolis; and as we were going up to it, we heard someone climbing behind us. When we turned around and looked back, we saw Senator GREEN rapidly climbing the hill; and the young man who was accompanying him was several steps behind him, with his tongue virtually hanging out.

Many other stories could be told about the stamina and the durability of Senator GREEN. Much more could be said of his great interest in a host of subjects. He is a wonderful person.

I have known Senator GREEN best during the course of my service on the Foreign Relations Committee. He is a magnificent Senator and a priceless friend.

It is with genuine regret that I think of his retiring from membership in this body.

Wherever Senator GREEN goes, whatever occupation he takes up, even if he decides to get married, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has suggested as a possibility—for Senator GREEN is the most eligible bachelor in the entire Senate, and perhaps in the country at large—whatever his future endeavors may be, I certainly wish for him, and I am certain this is equally true of all the other Members of this body and of all other persons who know him, many, many years of great happiness.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, the Good Book tells us that when a man has lived a life span of 3 score years and 10, the time then comes when he can rest on his laurels and spend his declining years enjoying well-earned rest and retirement. It is a rare privilege to rise today to honor a man who began a completely new, vigorous, and demanding life at the time he reached 3 score years and 10. I say with confidence that the record he has made will never be duplicated in the history of this country. Now, at the age of 92, he has served 23 fruitful years in the U.S. Senate.

THEODORE GREEN has played a large part in charting our Ship of State through the most perilous periods this country has ever known. Next to the occupant of the White House and his Secretary of State, no individual has a more responsible and demanding position in regard to the external affairs of the United States than does the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. As a member or as chairman or chairman emeritus of this committee, Senator GREEN has served with three Presidents and seven Secretaries of State. The duties and responsibilities that were inherent in this position would have taxed both the physical and mental facilities of even the youngest of men. No man, regardless of age or intellect, could have done a better job than has been performed by Senator GREEN in this long period of service.

Our country is most fortunate when it has public servants whose driving motivation is based solely and alone on a passionate love and devotion for the welfare of this country. Senator GREEN is one of those rare individuals to whom emoluments of office and material gain have no attraction whatsoever. His reward could only be the self-satisfaction of a job well done and the knowledge that his efforts contributed substantially to the security, welfare, and future of this country.

When the 87th Congress convenes next January, there will be a void that will be keenly felt by every present Member of the U.S. Senate. Not only do we love and respect THEODORE GREEN, but we have learned to rely on his acumen in so many fields of legislative effort. He is an elder statesman who never became an elder. No man in public life today and few that will come tomorrow will ever deserve of their country a higher niche in the honor, adulation, and respect of all the people of these United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to join with my colleagues in paying a very just and much deserved tribute to the illustrious and distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Senator GREEN has been described this morning by my colleagues in most illustrative and definitive terms. The Senator from Arkansas spoke of him as a teacher, as a businessman, as a Governor, as a political leader, as a statesman, and as a wrestler—an amateur wrestler, but with the qualities of a professional, I should add. And this great man has wrestled with many a problem and, insofar as my memory recalls, he has always pinned those problems to the mat.

Senator GREEN is an example of a forever youthful spirit, not only here in the Senate, but in all his many activities. I have admired this man much, not only because of his attention to detail in the Senate, his dedication to public service, his remarkable qualities, character, and integrity, but I have admired him because he has had such a full life. He is interested in everything in God's creation.

He has always attracted great public attention, not because of some particular twist of a phrase, even though he is very capable of that, but primarily because of his wholesome activities, his diversity of interests, and the vigor and vitality with which he throws himself into these many areas of activity.

Senator GREEN is a partisan, too, and he is a good partisan. He is a real Democrat, with a capital "D" and a small "d." I know of no man who has a more progressive and liberal record in Congress, and yet he maintains the respect of persons of every political persuasion.

He has apparently no doubts, either, about his votes. I myself have many times been concerned as to how I should vote. That doubt was resolved when I looked over and heard Senator GREEN vote, with a true tone and with complete confidence and understanding and assurance. He has said either "yea" or "nay," and there has not been even a quaver in his voice when he has spoken his judgment. The trumpet is certain, not uncertain.

Though a great partisan, he has been a great public servant, and as a Governor of his State he attained the respect of other Governors, both before and after he was Governor. He was a political leader who built a political organization in the State of Rhode Island that was the envy of political leaders in every State in the Union.

Of course, I think one of the finest demonstrations of his great leadership and qualities is a gentlemen who followed in his footsteps, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], and I say this most sincerely and respectfully. Of course, the junior Senator from Rhode Island has his own standards and leads his own life, but he has told his colleagues and friends of his profound respect and admiration for Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

I therefore pay my respects to this man who has decided to do something else, who has decided to turn over his place in the Senate to someone else, so that he can return to amateur wrestling, business, teaching, or whatever he desires. I know it will be something, and it will be interesting and it will be done well.

Of course, I am not sure whether he will change enough to cease being the Nation's most eligible bachelor. I know this man can adapt himself to anything. I merely wish to say to him that now, his duties as a Senator having been fulfilled, this Nation's most eligible bachelor will be more eligible than ever.

So I pay my sincere respects to a wonderful man and a fine friend. I should like in this message to extend to him the respects of one of his lady friends, Mrs. Humphrey, who thinks very well of him. On one occasion I found them both standing on a street corner, ready to get into a cab together, until I interfered. I think the fact that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would want to escort her is as nice a compliment as could be paid to any lady. He has done that for other ladies, but, of course, I have not told this to Mrs. Humphrey.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I rise to salute the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, and to add my inadequate words to the tributes which have been pouring in from all over the Senate floor this morning.

First, I wish to say that I am sorry to note this depletion in the ranks of us younger Members of the Senate, because in spirit the Senator from Rhode Island has more vigor, more imagination, and more drive than any of us who are members of the so-called freshman class.

I appreciate fully that the Senator from Rhode Island is a distinguished national figure. I particularly appreciate, from the tributes which have been paid to him this morning, that he has a warm place in the hearts of his colleagues in the Senate. At the same time, I should like to claim a part of him for our common region of New England. His life, his career, and his accomplishments have a particular meaning for us in that six-State region of the country. He is a New Englander and a New England figure, radiating warmth, great capacity, humility, and deep concern in regard to the needs of New England, as well as the overriding problems of our country.

I have a personal regret, in that my service with him in the Senate will be so brief. I have looked forward to the 8 years which the distinguished Senator from Alabama believed would be available to us of his service in the Senate, as an opportunity to learn from his great experience. I regret deeply that I shall not be able to share much longer the companionship which many of our other colleagues in the Senate have enjoyed for a long time.

Speaking for my own State of Maine and for New England as a whole, I should like the Senate to know, if there is any doubt—and I am sure there is none—that we admire Senator GREEN, we love him, and we regret his decision to terminate his service in the Senate.

Because of the fact that I come from a State which for a very long period had not elected members of my party to office, I have had to admire him, up until last year, from afar. As a Democrat I took considerable satisfaction from the fact that he was among those who led the Democratic Party in Rhode Island out of the wilderness. We undertook to emulate his fine example in the State of Maine, with some small measure of success, which I think he also enjoyed.

So I say to Senator GREEN, it is with great personal regret I note his decision to terminate his service in this great body.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I think one of the greatest forces that is met in the experience of a Member of this body is pressure. The senior Senator from Rhode Island, in my opinion, is immune to pressure. He has proved that for 92 years.

However, now that he intends and plans to give up his membership in the Senate, I doubt if he will be quite so immune to pressure. On many occasions I have stood in amazement and listened to how he has resisted the pressure of matrimony. Now that he has shown in the Senate so many fine traits and characteristics, which many of us would like to emulate, and henceforth his duties will be less onerous and burdensome, there will be more pressure. I am sure Mrs. Humphrey is not the only person who has had designs on the senior Senator from Rhode Island. I can speak for a 17-year-old daughter who cherishes more than any other picture in her collection one she had taken on a birthday with the senior Senator from Rhode Island.

We have in our hearts a certain sadness because of his determination to retire. There is also, however, a feeling of gratefulness for the service he has performed. He will leave the duties of the senior Senator to a qualified and respected Member of this body, Mr. PASTORE.

All of us wish that the future life of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island will be one of continued happiness and pleasure, and that in whatever activity he may engage after his retirement from the Senate, it will be not only statewide, but also national and international.

I am very happy for the few years I have had the pleasure of being in the body with him, for the many moments I have had at the lunch table with him, and for the sound advice which he has so generously given.

So to you, Senator GREEN, many, many years of continued good health and happiness.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I too wish to join with other Senators in expressing my sadness and regret on hearing the announcement of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island that he does not intend to be a candidate for reelection in 1960.

He is indeed a rare man—a great man—and I consider it a privilege to have the honor of serving with him throughout the sessions of the 86th Congress.

It is noteworthy, Mr. President, that the senior Senator from Rhode Island is a frequent user of the Senate gymnasium facilities, where he exercises with remarkable vigor. Whether in the gymnasium, the Senate floor, or wherever he may be approached, he is never too busy or too preoccupied to discuss a problem or offer advice to his colleagues. We hold him in the highest admiration.

Furthermore, it is noteworthy that last year, shortly after the 1st session of the 86th Congress commenced, a seminar was organized to aid newer and younger Senators of what we call the class of 1958. We would meet on Monday evenings in the Old Supreme Court Chamber and have a social hour. Following dinner, we would listen to an address by some distinguished American. The purpose of this was to help us, as Senators, to better understand the problems of the Nation and the world, so that we could serve our constituencies and the Nation more adequately.

Among the younger Senators who frequently attended those seminars was the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

His devotion to duty, his long experience in both executive and legislative office, and his unrelenting efforts in the interests of our country will be sorely missed. His achievements will be long remembered. There is no finer example of patriotism than his. In this day and age, with so much emphasis and value placed upon power and influence, he voluntarily stepped down as chairman of one of the most powerful standing committees of the Senate, despite the unanimous vote of the committee members that he remain as chairman.

If the Senator from Rhode Island cannot be prevailed upon to change his mind, I join my colleagues in expressing my sorrow at his decision, and in wishing him a happy retirement, knowing, as all of my colleagues do, that the senior Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, will always be available to the Nation for counsel and advice.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I wish to join in what I know is the unanimous feeling of regret on the part of our colleagues in the Senate at the retirement of our very esteemed, beloved, and distinguished colleague [Mr. GREEN], our alltime senior Member. His departure will be a great loss to this body.

I do not know of any man who is more universally loved, respected, and admired. The fact that he has no enemies is not due to any lack of determination or courage, or forthrightness of expression. He has been a leader in the field of his interests. He has contributed to the information and enlightenment of his colleagues in all the discussions in which he has participated. He will be missed.

He leaves behind him a distinguished career of service which will never be forgotten, and which will be inscribed indelibly in the annals of this body.

I really do not know why the very youthful senior Senator from Rhode Island wishes to retire. A man of his years, who has retained the viewpoint and spirit of youth, ought not to take this conservative position. It is the first time I have ever known him to make such a serious error.

I know that if he were to change his mind in the next few months and decide to remain with us, his decision will be universally applauded. I hope his decision is not irrevocable. I think he will be prepared to live to be a hundred, and serve very usefully here or outside the Senate.

We love you, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, and we regret to see you go.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to join with the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], the leadership on both sides of the aisle, and all my other colleagues in expressing deep regret upon the announced departure from the Senate of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Senator GREEN has been chairman of two of the most important committees of the Senate, the Committee on Rules and Administration, and the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am sorry to know that he is voluntarily retiring at the end of his present term, because I know his loss will be felt, the advice which he has always so generously given will be missed, and the humor which he has always displayed will be lacking. He has performed great service, not only in behalf of his State, but also in behalf of our country and the entire free world.

I express the hope that even though our distinguished and lovable colleague is retiring on a voluntary basis, he will not forget us but will come back many times to see us, so that we can partake of his wisdom and advice.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] and other Senators who have preceded me in expressing my very great pleasure at having been privileged to serve in this body with the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and my regret that he has announced that at the end of the current session he will not be a candidate for reelection.

It has been one of the great pleasures of my life to know a man of his character and vigor, and who has made so great a contribution to good government at home and abroad, throughout a long and useful life. I shall remember with great pleasure the privilege of serving with him here and of being with him, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] said, on one occasion in a foreign land, when he was the youngest member of the group; of seeing him, as another Senator said, in the gymnasium; and in all the other fields of our activities.

I have had many contacts with him. It has been an inspiration to have served with a man who, though old in years, is young in vigor and spirit.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I desire to add my voice to the very fine tributes paid today to THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, our distinguished colleague from Rhode Island. It was with a profound sense of regret I learned of his decision not to seek reelection.

Regardless of political affiliation, I am sure all of us are very sorry that this distinguished public servant and statesman has decided not to attempt to return to the U.S. Senate. He has served his State and our Nation with distinction, both as a State official and as a Federal official. To all his activities he has brought wisdom and sound judgment rarely equaled. He has been a particularly astute student of international affairs, and in his work as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations he contributed substantially to this Nation's efforts to solidify the free world alliance in the cold war struggle with international communism.

It is reassuring to know that his keen intellect and sage advice will be available to the Senate throughout this session. I am confident that in the many years which lie ahead for our beloved colleague, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN will continue to work for those causes he feels best serve the welfare of the State of Rhode Island and of the United States. He would have it no other way. All of us are the richer for having had the privilege of working with him and knowing him.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, no Member of the United States Senate is held in higher esteem by his colleagues than the distinguished and beloved senior Senator from the State of Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. Lawyer, educator, scholar, State legislator, successful businessman, elected and reelected chief executive of his own State, and elected to the U.S. Senate, he has served the public with distinction for many years.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has carved for himself a long and unique chapter in his life of service to the people. During every moment of it he has held steadfast to the principles of good government as he saw them, and to all his work he has always brought a smile and a whimsical outlook which has delighted his colleagues and all others who have had the privilege of hearing him.

At a time when most persons would have long since been in retirement, THEODORE GREEN determined to become a candidate for the Senate; and at the age of 70 he held up his hand and commenced 22 years of honorable service here.

I have known him in the short 7 years I have served in the Senate, as an able presiding officer over the Foreign Relations Committee when I would go there and listen to the deliberations of that important group of the Senate. I have also had the honor of being associated with him as a fellow member of the delegation from our country to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization parliamentary conference on three occasions, in which capacity, as here, he gained the respect of those who knew him and worked with him.

I am one more Republican to speak in praise of the record of THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. Other Republicans may speak for themselves. Each of us may speak for himself. I am happy to join our Democratic colleagues in wishing THEODORE the best of health as he retires, looking forward, nevertheless, to his friendly counsel and his visits to the Capital of our beloved Nation again and again and again.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, like the other Members of the Senate and the hundreds of other friends and admirers of Senator THEODORE GREEN, of Rhode Island, I read the announcement of his planned retirement with deep regret.

Few men in the history of our Nation have served so actively, so capably, and so long as has Senator GREEN. His public service goes back before the turn of the century and includes military and civilian service during four wars and other periods of crisis of our Nation. His almost three-quarters of a century of service could never be completely appraised or evaluated, but I know we all can agree that Senator GREEN, throughout his public life, has treated public office as a public trust.

The confidence which the people of Rhode Island have in their senior Senator is shared with the rest of the Nation.

I sincerely regret that he is retiring from the Senate, but I am confident we will be hearing from him right along, even past the centenarian point of his life.

I hope Senator GREEN will have many more years in this world, and I hope he will continue to serve in the future as he has in the past. I know that he will do that.

Mr. LONG of Hawaii. Mr. President, I wish to join with the group of distinguished Senators who have paid tribute to Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. When I first had the privilege of coming to the National Capital to work in behalf of statehood for Hawaii, I found him to be not only courteous, but most helpful.

In the new State of Hawaii, we are rather proud of the basis on which the people of every racial group and every cultural background live. We refer to it as the spirit of aloha. I think of our distinguished colleague as one who in his thinking, in his speaking, and in every other way exemplifies that spirit. It is a privilege to pay tribute to him.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to add my tribute to the many which have been bestowed upon the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

It was with great sorrow that I received the news of Senator GREEN's decision not to seek reelection to the Senate. His keen perception, outstanding foresight, and brilliant mind will be sorely missed by those of us in the Senate and by Washingtonians generally. His wisdom, character, and vigor have been demonstrated on innumerable occasions throughout his successful career. Senator GREEN's friendship is treasured by all those who know him.

I welcome the statement by this great gentleman that his decision not to seek reelection is not equivalent to retirement from public life. I trust that his invaluable service will continue to be available to the people of Rhode Island and of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in the Senate today in expressing respect and affection for Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. I became a Member of the Senate long after Senator GREEN had earned his place as the "Grand Old Man" of the Senate. But to Senator GREEN age differences have never been important. He has always been as interested in the work of a freshman Senator as of a senior Senator. From my first day in the Senate I always felt I could turn to him and receive wise advice and helpful encouragement. I count it one of my great good fortunes that I will have been in this body during 8 of the 24 years of Senator GREEN's tenure.

Senator GREEN's life spans the greatest period of change America and the world have seen. It is startling to realize that the Civil War had ended just 2 years before he was born. Great events have happened since, and Senator GREEN's career has matched those events.

In one lifetime he has done enough to satisfy the ambitions of several other men. He has been soldier, statesman, politician, lawyer, banker, teacher, philanthropist, and Senator. When he entered the Senate, he had already achieved the greatest success and honor in at least seven careers. Perhaps this helps to explain his youthful approach as a Senator, for he tackled this new challenge with all the vigor and enthusiasm of an ambitious and capable man, determined to make his mark in the world. And make his mark he did.

If the Senate was THEODORE GREEN'S eighth life, and if he is limited to the proverbial cat's nine—although this seems unlikely, considering the subject—then we must look with interest and some envy to his new achievements and honors.

Mr. HENNINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, at the outset I should like to say that I regret I was called from the floor during the period of time when tributes were paid to the distinguished dean of the U.S. Senate, our beloved friend and colleague, the great Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

I hope, at an appropriate time in the next few days, to make a more complete statement, in an effort at least partially to express some of the admiration, the affection, and the appreciation which, together with all my colleagues, I have for Senator GREEN, and to express again, as I have to him personally, my deep regret that he has come to the decision at which he has arrived.

He will always be one of us in spirit, even if he is not always with us, sitting on the floor and in committee, as he has been for these many years.

During the greater part of his life, Senator GREEN has devoted himself to the public service, as Governor of his State, as a U.S. Senator, as a member of the board of Brown University, and in many other activities which I shall later mention.

I should like to say that I have had the opportunity and privilege of serving with him for 10 years on the Committee on Rules and Administration, and that it was when he relinquished the chairmanship of that committee that I became chairman of it. I am making every effort to follow in the path which, as chairman of that committee, he so well delineated. I have been guided and influenced and immeasurably assisted on many, many occasions by his unfailing good counsel and his expression of friendship and statesmanlike courage on so many matters which have come before that committee, this body, and the Democratic policy committee, on which I have served for 7 years with Senator GREEN. I look forward during the remainder of this year to continue to be guided and assisted by his presence and his very active participation, indeed, in the deliberations of that body as well.

Mr. CHURCH subsequently said: Mr. President, unfortunately, I was unable to be in the Chamber when, earlier today, the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] and many other Senators joined in tributes to the beloved senior Senator from Rhode Island, the chairman emeritus of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and mentor and friend of a generation in the Senate, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

But I cannot let this day pass without adding my voice to this chorus. Senator GREEN and I have had our names linked frequently since I have been here, representing as we have the two poles of chronological age in the Senate. I have been pleased and proud when this has happened. When we shared a birthday cake for the photographers once, the twinkle in his eye and the cheer of his smile made him look the younger.

I served under him on the Committee on Foreign Relations when he was its chairman, and his kindliness and wisdom will be cherished by me always.

His friend, a friend of the Senate, William S. White, paid a wonderful tribute to Senator GREEN in the Washington Star today. He has spoken, I think, for all of us who have known and worked with Senator GREEN, for a long or for a short time, in characterizing him as a "combat soldier, and not a talking soldier."

We all shall miss him when he retires.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "Senator GREEN Nears Retirement," written by William S. White, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington (D.C.) Evening Star, Jan. 13, 1960]

SENATOR GREEN NEARS RETIREMENT—RHODE ISLANDER LAUDED AS TRUE LIBERAL, AND YOU KNEW WHERE HE STOOD

(By William S. White)

The old, old man is going at last from the Senate.

In the 93d year of his life, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, of Rhode Island, has announced he will not seek reelection to his fifth term because he does not feel well enough.

He is not, of course, indispensable. And a man can work only so long as strength remains. Too, his State will have no trouble in finding a replacement.

All the same, when THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN leaves, the Senate will be the poorer, in the strictly human sense, anyhow, for his departure. For, oddly, in this correspondent's time it has been mainly the very old men there who have given a special quality to the place.

There, more often than not, it is the very old who will take the greatest risks. Who are the least influenced by today's universal urge for personal security. Who are the most ready to run forward to meet the possibly menacing tomorrow. They are, again more often than not, the best of the individual men, the free and fighting spirits who make the youngsters look rather like conscientious objectors.

To be sure, the problems of the aged—which is a Nice-Nelly phrase admitting that society tends to throw the aged upon the ash heap—exist in the Senate, too. Even there, men can grow too old to go on any more—but happily it takes an awfully long time to grow that old in the Senate.

Senator GREEN at a mere 70 carried not simply a full load but a great load, as a personally aristocratic and privileged man who went all the way with the Roosevelt New Deal. Senator GREEN at a ripe 80 was tough enough and strong enough to take on one of the hardest and most thankless jobs the Senate had handed out in this century.

This was to serve on the first committee that investigated Senator Joseph R. McCarthy's charges of communism in the State Department. Nobody could hope to win in that mare's nest—nobody but, in the short run, Senator McCarthy himself. For fear and suspicion were loose in a country that had suffered great and undeniable setbacks from imperialist communism. The Nation was ready for a devil hunt; it was all there to be exploited.

But old Senator GREEN, unlike some of his committee colleagues, faced the unalterable facts with the special candor and realism of the Senate's aged men. He knew Senator McCarthy and his associates were making a bitter brew that at length would spill over on the Republicans as well—as it did when the Eisenhower administration came to power. But he knew that, first of all, Senator McCarthy was reaching for the throat not simply of President Truman and Secretary Acheson, but of the Democratic Party which Senator GREEN loved.

So, full of the self-honesty of the old Senate types, T. F. GREEN from the first moment made no pretense to an objectivity that could not exist here. From the first moment he hit Senator McCarthy with everything to which he could lay hand.

He was a true liberal, as distinguished from a knee-jerk liberal. And he was a loyal liberal, instead of a cut-and-run liberal.

He stayed with Mr. Truman in the good times, and also in the bad times. In the times, indeed, when some of the knee-jerk liberals were self-righteously rushing into print (to coin a sparkling phrase) to run out on a liberal President who had represented the views which they had always said were also their own. But this was a President who also now had the bad luck to get into trouble. So though they were just terribly, terribly liberal, they also managed to be terribly, terribly safe.

It was only the true liberals like old Senator GREEN, plus some nonliberals who believed in most but not all of what he was doing, who stood with Mr. Truman when the heavy firing about corruption and cronyism broke out.

Mr. Truman has never hated, or even much disliked, all those who had fought him from conviction, the Republicans and the ultraconservative Democrats. But he has an unforgettable contempt for those who really agreed with his policies but prudently left the firing line when it became evident that his troops were going to be overborne.

Old Senator GREEN may have been intellectually wrong in staying in the line to the end. But he was a combat soldier, and not a talking soldier. He had guts.

Mr. MONRONEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in regard to the retirement of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE GREEN.

Certainly a man who has managed to serve ably and well at the most advanced age a Senator has ever attained in this body has achieved a distinction; but to have served so ably and well with such great good humor, such energy, and such a desire to discharge to the fullest his responsibilities as a Senator marks him as perhaps one of the most unusual and one of the most devoted Senators it has ever been my pleasure to know.

Senators will remember that because of his advancing age and a diminishing of his faculty of sight he voluntarily called into session the great Committee on Foreign Relations, of which he had the honor to be the chairman, and announced his retirement from the chairmanship. This marked Senator GREEN, I believe, as a man who put the love and performance of duty far ahead of any personal desire for power, standing, attainment, or continued control of this very vital activity of the U.S. Senate. Knowing that he would probably later relinquish control, he wanted to help pass it on at an earlier time to younger hands, so that the younger hands could gain experience, with the passing of time, in order to properly direct the great committee.

Senator GREEN is an unselfish man, a man of great personal wit and humor and charm. He is a man whom every one of the 99 other Senators is proud to call a friend.

The only act he has performed during my long acquaintanceship with him which I did not like and approve of was to announce his voluntary retirement at the end of his present term. I should like to see him continue to serve, and I still hope perhaps he may change his mind and decide to follow the wishes of his friends and again serve in the great U.S. Senate.

He is a man whom history will record as having attained new heights in many, many ways. We will miss him deeply.

Mr. YARBOROUGH subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to take the opportunity to associate myself with the remarks of my many colleagues who this afternoon have paid tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island, that unforgettably courageous and dedicated Democrat, the Honorable THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Few men in the history of this Nation have had the iron will and fortitude to proudly swallow defeat after defeat at the polls and return again and again in subsequent elections until the people learned that in him they had opportunity to elect a dedicated public servant. Courage and tenacity characterized his fight to serve the people, and once he attained office, he used that same courage and tenacity almost invariably to stand on the side of the people.

In fact, it should be considered by all of us, I believe, that that same courage marks his decision of retirement, for the temptation must have been very great for him to simply return to the Senate. And there is surely no question that his millions of friends would have seen to it that he came back to Washington for as long as he wished. But as a man who had the courage to fight for what he believed in, he still has the courage to face up to the realization that his health would be further impaired by adding to his already long and great record of public service.

All of us who know what a fine, friendly, devoted, kindly, scholarly gentleman he is, all of us who have had the great benefit and pleasure of his warm friendship and support, will miss him a great deal. And our hearts go out to him for many, many more years of health and happiness.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I think my colleagues in the Senate will realize that this is an embarrassing moment for me. I have sat here and listened to descriptions purporting to be of myself, but which I could hardly recognize. I have however, found the occasion to be very pleasant.

After listening for some time I began to wonder whether or not a great mistake had been made. My mind wandered a little, and I thought of myself as lying in a coffin in front of the dais of the Presiding Officer, with my colleagues going by and dropping a flower or two as they passed.

I do not believe very much in that sort of thing. I am afraid I do not bestow compliments as often as they are deserved. Today I certainly have received them far beyond my deserts.

Various speakers have referred to incidents which I had almost forgotten, and which they recalled to my mind, much to my pleasure.

There is one impression I wish to correct. It should not be assumed that because I had said I would not be a candidate for reelection in the next election, I was retiring from public life. I do not want that impression to get abroad, especially in Rhode Island. I am ready to serve my friends the people—who really are my friends—whenever they feel that they need me.

However, because of physical infirmities which are creeping up on me in my advanced years, I do not feel that I can adequately represent, for another 6 years, my people of Rhode Island, the State of Rhode Island, or the United States of America, as I should.

I am very happy in my life here. I am very happy in the associations which have been formed. I have found them to be most stimulating, even when my colleagues have disagreed with me, which has often been the case. It has been a wonderful experience, which relatively few men can have. I am very grateful for the way my colleagues have learned to put up with the objectionable features of their colleague in formal oratory, discussion, or conversation.

I have made many good friends. I hope I have not lost any previously made. It is a wonderful experience to be a Senator of the United States. It is an office which calls for every mark of kindness and friendship which one human being can show toward others.

I highly cherish my service in this body, for what it has done for me. Judging from what I have heard today on the floor of the Senate, it is thought by some that I have done something for my countrymen.

I am very grateful to the people of my State for having given me this privilege. I am very grateful to Almighty God, Who has kept me in good health and enabled me to take advantage of my opportunities here. I promise that the remainder of my life shall be heartily devoted to the service of the people, for at least 1 year more in the Senate, and after that just as heartily at home.

I thank my fellow Senators heartily for what they have said. Though undeserved much of it may have been, it was very pleasant to hear it. I want them to feel free at any time to call on me for any service I can render them, or which they think I can render them, and to forgive anything I may have said or done in the past to which they have taken exception.

Again thanks to all of them for what they have said this morning, in addition to what they have been to me in the years past. [Applause, Senators rising.]

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of American Samoa; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Concurrent resolution requesting the Congress of the United States of America to enact organic legislation establishing a civil government for our country

"Whereas our people expressed a keen desire for organic legislation in a petition signed by all our leaders, the matais of Tutuila and Manu's, at a general assembly held in 1945 at Gagamoe, a historical meeting place of our people; and

"Whereas a committee consisting of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior, recommended to the President of the United States in 1947 the enactment of organic legislation for our territory as a step toward the fulfillment of the obligation assumed by the United States under article 73 of the United Nations Charter; and

"Whereas in 1949 the Department of the Interior, with the strong support of the President of the United States, recommended immediate enactment of organic legislation for our country in order to extend to us U.S. citizenship, a bill of rights, local legislative powers, an independent judiciary, and a representation by a Resident Commissioner in the U.S. Congress; and

"Whereas we firmly believe that the enactment of organic legislation for American Samoa is the most effective and satisfactory way to discharge the responsibility of the United States under the United Nations Charter and to maintain fully its traditional role as the champion among nations of dependent people, of representative government, of justice under law, and of fundamental rights and human freedoms for everyone everywhere; and

"Whereas with respect to organic legislation, it is the policy of the Department of the Interior to support such legislation when our people desire it and are ready for it, and our people, through their duly elected representatives, are asking for such legislation, believing firmly that our people are ready to begin their God-given right to make their own local laws; and

"Whereas the enactment of organic legislation for our country will not only furnish our people the fruits of democracy but will also serve notice to all nations in the Pacific Ocean area that the right of self-determination and freedom from oppression are granted by the Constitution of the United States by acts as well as by words; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Sixth Legislature of the Territory of American Samoa (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it is hereby, respectfully requested to enact H.R. 4500, introduced in the House of Representatives of the 81st Congress of the United States of America, as the same will be amended by the Sixth Legislature of the Territory of American Samoa and approved by a convention of the people of American Samoa called for that purpose; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States of America, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress, to the chairman of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Governor of American Samoa."

Two petitions, signed by Thomas Hugh Latimer, executive vice president, Free World Committee, Chicago, Ill., relating to Communist domination of independent people; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The petition of H. Joseph Mahoney, of Bronxville, N.Y., praying for the adoption of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 106) expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to the recognition of the grave of Samuel Wilson, progenitor of the symbol "Uncle Sam"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES, FREE SYNAGOGUE, FLUSHING, N.Y.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the Free Synagogue, of Flushing, N.Y., relating to the defacement of synagogue property.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The board of trustees of the Free Synagogue, of Flushing, N.Y., at its regular meeting held at the community house of the synagogue last evening, January 4, 1960, unanimously adopted the following motion concerning the recent defacement of synagogue property with symbols of religious bigotry:

1. The board registers its indignation and dismay at the recent defacement of the property of the Free Synagogue of Flushing, as well as other houses of Jewish worship and Jewish institutions in the city and elsewhere, with swastikas, the infamous symbol of religious bigotry and hateful intolerance;

2. Approves and applauds the prompt and determined efforts of the mayor of the city of New York in activating the forces of law and order and religious amity to detect and prosecute the perpetrators of these foul acts of ignorance and intolerance; and

3. Pledge themselves, collectively and individually to do all within their power to aid and cooperate in all lawful efforts to prevent the recurrence of such incidents of infamy.

RESOLUTION OF TOWN BOARD OF SOUTHOLD, N.Y.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Town Board of Southold, N.Y., relating to an infestation of the golden nematode.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Town Board of the Town of Southold, Suffolk County, N.Y., being apprised of the increase of golden nematode infestation of the farmland of Southhold Town and also in the farmland of other towns of Suffolk County, and furthermore, that this infestation poses a serious threat to the economy and well-being of the residents of Southold Town and the other towns of Suffolk County: Be it

Resolved, That the Town Board of the Town of Southold does strongly urge that the State of New York and the U.S. Government, not only continue the present program for the control and eradication of the golden nematode but also expand and expedite this program so that this serious threat to the agriculture of this area as well as the whole Nation may be speedily and permanently eliminated; furthermore be it

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Assemblyman Irving Price and State Senator Elisha Barrett, Congressman Stuyvesant Wainwright and U.S. Senators Kenneth Keating and Jacob Javits, and also to the Board of Supervisors of Suffolk County so that the rest of the towns of the county may be apprised of the serious situation and take appropriate action.

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF EDUCATION, WYANDANCH, N.Y.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the board of education, Union Free School District No. 9, of Wyandanch, N.Y., relating to aid to education.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas too much of the cost of education is now on the shoulders of the local homeowners;

Whereas any new scheme of local taxation, such as local sales taxes, will only increase the burden on homeowners with large families, families with small incomes, etc.; and

Whereas such plans will lessen the sense of responsibility on the part of the State government and Federal Government toward contributing a fair share of the cost of education: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New York increase State aid to at least $409 per pupil.

Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 241) authorizing a study of matters pertaining to the revision and codification of the statutes of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to revision and codification of the statutes of the United States.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis technical, clerical, and other asistants and consultants: Provided, That if more than one counsel is employed, the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1961.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF ADMINISTRATION OF NATIONAL SECURITY LAW AND MATTERS RELATING TO ESPIONAGE

Mr. EASTLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 242) authorizing an investigation of the administration of the national security law and matters relating to espionage, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, insofar as they relate to the authority of the committee hereunder, to make a complete and continuing study and investigation of (1) the administration, operation, and enforcement of the Internal Security Act of 1950, as amended; (2) the administration, operation, and enforcement of other laws relating to espionage, sabotage, and the protection of the internal security of the United States; and (3) the extent, nature, and effect of subversive activities in the United States, its Territories and possessions, including, but not limited to, espionage, sabotage, and infiltration by persons who are or may be under the domination of the foreign government or organizations controlling the world Communist movement or any other movement seeking to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, from February 1, 1960, to January 31, 1961, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $239,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

REMOVAL OF LIMITATION ON INCOME UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to remove the earnings limitations on the amount of outside income an individual may earn while receiving social security benefits.

Mr. President, I point out this is a bill with regard to which the late Senator Langer, our dear departed colleague, was the principal sponsor and I was a cosponsor. In a sense, I am picking up the torch from the place where the late Senator Langer because of an act of divine providence laid it for someone else to pick up and run with.

At the present time, women over 62 years of age and men over 65 do not receive full benefits under the old-age and survivors section of the Social Security Act if they earn more than $1,200 annually, or more than $100 in any month, until they reach the age of 72 when the earnings limitation no longer applies.

In order that this important amendment to the Social Security Act which was previously introduced by our distinguished former colleague, the late Senator Langer, may be actively pursued in this body during the current session, I am submitting it this year. The House Ways and Means Committee is reported to be scheduling early consideration of social security amendments and this bill, introduced in the other body by several Representatives, is pending before it so that there is every reason to hope for action on it in the near future.

The Social Security Administration estimates that 2 million persons would benefit if this amendment were adopted. That is the approximate number of individuals who, although they or another wage-earning member of their family have already contributed the full amount required by law, are not receiving their full social security payments because either by choice or, more likely, by necessity, they are continuing to work full or part-time. They get a sum below the average annual payment of about $850 which is received by the social security beneficiaries or their dependents who are fully retired.

If an individual's wages exceed the modest annual figure of $2,080, he is not eligible to receive a single dollar in social security payments despite the fact that he is paid up in full under the system until he attains the age of 72.

In view of the impact of inflation on our economy resulting in a marked increase in the cost of such basic items as food costs, rent, clothing, and particularly hospitalization and medical care which are of special concern to older age groups, the present earnings limitations under social security are unrealistic and impose a severe hardship on many of our senior citizens who continue to contribute their talents and service to U.S. business and industry.

By adopting this proposed amendment, the Congress would be removing an inequitable provision of the Social Security Act and at the same time be taking full cognizance of the needs of our older citizens who have devoted their working lives to the upbuilding of our Nation and its economy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2793) to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to remove the limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits thereunder, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CULTURAL ACTIVITIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that 1 mill out of each $1 of tax revenue of the government of the District of Columbia be set aside in a special fund to be used by the Recreation Board for the District of Columbia to defray in part the expenses of the National Symphony Orchestra, the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and other nonprofit art and cultural programs of the District.

There can be no doubt that the city of Washington is truly one of the most beautiful in the entire world. All who come here are impressed by the city's lovely tree-lined streets, beautiful parks, and its public buildings.

Throughout my service in the Senate, I have consistently supported measures to improve the city of Washington and to make it an even more beautiful and pleasant city in which to live. I shall continue to support such programs because I believe it is in the best interest not only of the city of Washington but the United States itself. After all, Washington is a picture window through which the people of other nations look and draw their judgments about America. Washington should represent the artistic and cultural aspirations of the American people.

Unfortunately, all too little has been done to promote the arts in the Nation's Capital. I was most interested in the study prepared last year by the Library of Congress for Representative HARRIS B. MCDOWELL, of Delaware, which revealed that Washington's budget has allotted for civic cultural event only $16,000—of which about $10,000 helps to support the Watergate concerts. As compared with Washington, New York spends $2,600,000, Philadelphia $824,000, and Baltimore $448,000. The small city of Hagerstown, Md., only a short distance from the Nation's Capital, gives its Museum of Fine Arts $12,500 out of its regular annual budget—only $3,500 less than the entire amount that Washington spends out of its more than $200 million budget.

To date, the promotion and financing of opera, ballet, orchestras, and theaters has been left primarily up to the citizens of Washington itself. Precious little has been given by the District Government to promote the arts. If any city in the United States should be spending money to promote the arts, it should certainly be Washington, the Capital of the United States. I, therefore, believe it is time that Washington join with other cities of our great country to promote the arts by providing that at least a small portion of tax revenue go for such programs.

Under my bill, 1 mill out of every dollar of tax revenue of the District of Columbia, would be deposited in a special fund in the Treasury of the United States. The money in such fund would be made available to the Recreation Board for the District of Columbia to help in defraying at least in part the expenses of the National Symphony Orchestra, the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and other nonprofit art programs.

We can be proud of our fine National Symphony Orchestra and of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, but we in the Congress can take little pride in the fact that we as the City Council of Washington have done precious little to promote these institutions and other cultural programs of the District. We have an obligation to join with the citizens of the District to give financial support for the fine arts of Washington.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the study made by the Library of Congress at the request of Representative McDOWELL, to which I have referred, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that two letters to the editor, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star of December 23, 1959, and which deal with this subject, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SHORTCHANGING ITSELF ON CULTURE?

I want to commend the Star for the excellent article about the Corcoran Gallery of Art by John McKelway on Sunday, December 13. It is good to have the Star assure us that the Corcoran is vigorously alive on its 100th birthday and looking forward to its second century of service in art and the associated field of education.

But, naturally, along with many other people, it is Mr. McKelway's discussion of what will be needed during these coming years that holds my deepest concern.

To begin with, one point should be fully understood. It is useless and, indeed, misleading to compare the income of the National Gallery of Art with that of the Corcoran. These two great galleries represent two quite different setups. The National Gallery is federally owned and largely federally supported; the Corcoran is not and never has been, nor did William Wilson Corcoran intend that the gallery which bears his name would be a Federal Government institution.

The comparison, rather, should be between the Corcoran and, say, New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, and with other municipal museums throughout the country. These museums are greatly assisted by municipal tax funds and couldn't continue to remain open without such financial assistance.

According to a recent study made by the Library of Congress for Representative HARRIS B. MCDOWELL, JR., Democrat, of Delaware, included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 14, 1959, this city spends far less on cultural activities than any of the other 38 cities surveyed. Our budget for the fine arts is only $16,000, as compared with New York's $2,600,000, Philadelphia's $824,000, and Baltimore's $448,500.

Why, Hagerstown, Md., gives its Museum of Fine Arts $12,500, which is provided out of its regular annual budget, only $3,500 less than the entire amount the Nation's Capital spends out of its more than $200 million budget.

The Star says the Corcoran Gallery needs a little outside help. No; what it needs is inside help, and judging from Mr. McKelway's remarks about lack of heat, of air conditioning, and of peeling walls and canceled exhibitions, more than a little help is needed.

Representative MCDOWELL has introduced a bill to provide 1 mill out of each tax dollar for art and music programs. The bill is cosponsored on a bipartisan basis by Representative CARROLL D. KEARNS, Republican, of Pennsylvania; Representative JOHN R. FOLEY, Democrat, of Maryland; and Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana. Also, the intent of this bill has the support of a wide range of groups including the American Federation of Musicians, the AFL–CIO, and even the Washington Board of Trade.

The plan suggested in this bill is one currently in use in scores of cities where their appreciation of the value of their art galleries, museums, and symphony orchestras produces significant civic support and action. Why should not such help be sought, and given, by Washington, D.C.?

We need not try to compete with the ancient capitals of Europe and Russia. We are still in the process of making our world. But let us compete with our fellow American cities so we can take our proper place in the growing cultural life of these United States.

HORTENSE AMRAM.

The Star's Sunday feature article, "The Corcoran, at 100, Is Still Looking Ahead," is commendable, but the Corcoran Gallery should have been compared, not with the National Gallery of Art, but with the Nation's local, city-aided museums and galleries.

The Star points out that the National Gallery receives a yearly grant from the Federal Government of $1,853,000. This is true, but information on the amount of financial support given local museums by U.S. cities would have been more apropos and significant—and helpful.

Baltimore contributes $303,000 to the Walters Art Gallery; Buffalo gives $73,430 to the Albright Art Gallery; Chicago gives the Art Institute of Chicago $232,405; Dallas gives its Fine Arts Museum $80,000; Houston its Museum of Fine Arts $20,000; Kansas City its Nelson Art Gallery $21,211; Newark (N.J.) gives the Newark Museum $525,426; New Orleans gives its Delgado Museum of Art $40,000; New York gives the Metropolitan Museum of Art the magnificent sum of $1,849,514; Norfolk gives its Museum of Art $69,083. Philadelphia gives the Philadelphia Art Museum $624,760; Pittsburgh gives its Arts and Crafts Center $25,000; St. Louis gives its Art Museum $320,007; San Diego gives its Fine Arts Gallery $57,159. San Francisco, with a population of 775,000, gives its three city-aided art museums a grand total of $658,891.

Washington, D.C., with a population greater by 100,000, and one of the wealthiest cities in the United States per capita, doesn't give its splendid local art museums, such as the Corcoran Gallery, one red cent.

The District of Columbia Commissioners have requested $10,000 for the Watergate Concerts for the past 2 years and Congress has gladly appropriated this sum. There is every reason for believing that if the Commissioners requested an equal or greater sum for the Corcoran Gallery from local tax revenues Congress would gladly appropriate this also.

It is high time the Commissioners displayed a concern for cultural matters at least equal to that of other U.S. city governing groups.

WILLIAM A. GRANT,
National Committeeman, Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2796) to provide for the adoption in the Nation's Capital of the practice common to many other cities in the United States with regard to cultural activities by depositing in a special fund 1 mill out of each $1 of tax revenue of the government of the District of Columbia to be used for the National Symphony Orchestra, the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and other nonprofit art programs of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, by amending the act of April 29, 1942, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXPANSION OF SPECIAL SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to improve and expand the special school milk program.

Generally, the bill would increase funds available as follows: The allowable $81 million for fiscal year 1960 would be increased to $85 million; for fiscal year 1961 and successive years, $90 million would be made available.

The proposal, too, would establish the special milk program on a permanent basis.

Overall, this program has provided a constructive outlet for surplus milk, as well as made a real contribution to better health of the children of America.

In fiscal year 1959, over 2.2 billion half pints of milk were distributed to children in nursery schools, child care centers, summer camps, and similar nonprofit institutions devoted to the care and training of children.

As I understand, funds for the current year are running low. Although the Department may not spend more than the allowable $81 million, the administration of the program requires elbow room for its operations. Unless additional funds are provided, the Department of Agriculture informs me that there will need to be cutbacks in the program beginning March 1, 1960.

Fortunately, a subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee has scheduled hearings next week on this situation. I would respectfully urge that the Senate committee consider the recommendations in this bill as early as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2797) to increase and extend the special milk program, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

COMMISSION TO STUDY COMPENSATION FOR LAND CONDEMNED UNDER FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in recent years the Federal Government has instituted programs under which millions of acres of land have been acquired from private owners. While much of the land has been acquired by purchase, a great deal has been acquired through condemnation proceedings; and in the cases in which voluntary sales were effected, the threat of condemnation proceedings was in the background.

These Federal programs include some in which Federal agencies use the land directly—for example, in the military programs; in other cases, the land is owned by State or local agencies—for example, in most road programs; and, in other cases, the land may be resold for private use—for example, in the urban renewal program. But regardless of these differences in the purpose of the taking or the use to which the land is put, the individual or business dispossessed or otherwise affected by the acquisition suffers the same loss.

Probably the biggest acquisition program has been that of the military. I am advised that in 1940, the War and Navy Departments used about 2½ million acres of land. By the close of the war, these two Departments had the use of 52 million acres—about equal in size to Kansas or Utah.

By June 30, 1955, the land used for military purposes by the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the AEC, amounted to more than 23 million acres—about the size of Indiana, Virginia, Kentucky, or Tennessee. Other Federal programs have acquired or are acquiring substantial amounts of land.

In the urban renewal program under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, the first 400 projects have called for the clearance of about 15,000 acres, not including streets and alleys. Unlike much of the land used for military programs, these 15,000 net acres are located in urban areas, and consist mostly of developed land. The Federal highway programs also call for the acquisition of large areas, including both expensive developed land in cities, and farmland and wasteland outside cities. For the Interstate Highway System, $621 million—of which the Federal share will be $418 million—is authorized for the acquisition of rights-of-way during the fiscal year 1959. Under the regular Federal highway programs, $126 million—of which the Federal share will be $65 million—is authorized for acquisition of rights-of-way during the fiscal year 1959. Other Federal programs, such as the public works programs, involve the acquisition of large areas.

The acquisition of land in this volume is very different from the Federal acquisition of land during the 19th century, or even during the 20th century, up to World War II. The problems created when, under Federal programs, thousands of acres of land is acquired in rural areas, or scores of acres are acquired in developed urban areas, are different, both in kind and in degree, from the problems created in earlier days, when Federal acquisitions of land amounted merely to taking enough land for the construction of a post office, an arsenal, or even an army post. And the problem becomes particularly acute when an urban-renewal project cleans out an entire section of town—the houses, stores, office buildings, movie theaters, banks, churches, and all other structures.

The Banking and Currency Committee has heard testimony which has set forth in dramatic detail the problems facing businesses, both large and small, which have been wiped out by urban-renewal projects or by Federal highway projects. Three bills on this subject have been introduced: S. 1340, by Senator HUMPHREY; S. 1351, by Senator BEALL; and S. 1777, by Senator CLARK and Senator JAVITS, which would provide for loans to small business concerns affected by the highway and urban-renewal programs.

The problem, of course, is not limited to small businesses or to these two Federal programs. The problem affects all sizes of business, and it affects all Federal programs under which land is acquired—particularly, of course, when the land acquisitions are very extensive. It was, I think, for this reason that the Banking and Currency Committee did not take action on any of these three bills in connection with either the small business legislation or the housing legislation.

It seems to me the question is a matter of much broader concern, and one which basically goes back to the requirement of the fifth amendment to the Constitution that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Over many years, this constitutional requirement has been spelled out in judicial decisions and in statutes within the framework of the constitutional requirement. For the most part, this occurred before acquisitions of land by the Federal Government were substantial or had drastic effects upon wide areas. As I have said, there is a difference in kind, as well as a difference in degree, between acquiring enough land for a Federal office building, or even acquiring the Federal Triangle, and acquiring a square mile of city land for an urban-renewal project or acquiring a whole valley for the purpose of flooding it in connection with the construction of a dam.

It is because of this change in the nature and the effect of land acquisitions under Federal programs, either by condemnation or under threat of condemnation, that I think it desirable to make a thorough and impartial study of condemnation under Federal programs. This study should be broad enough to cover land acquisition under the highway program, under public works programs, under urban-renewal programs, under military programs, and any other Federal programs. It should also be broad enough to cover all the effects of land acquisition, including its effects on owners, on tenants, and on nearby property and businesses. The study should be made in the broad spirit of the just-compensation provision of the fifth amendment. It should not be limited to a determination of the legal bounds of that provision or of any particular statute. Instead, it should cover the broader subject of the extent to which the cost of Federal programs is paid by individuals or firms whose property is taken or whose property or business is either destroyed or is reduced in value by the taking of neighboring property, and the extent to which it would be feasible and proper to compensate these individuals and firms for the losses they suffer by reason of the Federal program.

Accordingly, I introduce a bill which would establish a bipartisan Federal Commission on Property Condemnation Compensation, to consist of 15 members, 7 to be appointed by the President, 4 to be appointed by the Vice President, and 4 to be appointed by the Speaker. The Commission would make a thorough study of compensation in connection with the condemnation of land, and would file a report with the Congress by December 31, 1961.

In introducing this bill, I do not, of course, wish to take the position that any particular judicial awards have been either too high or too low; nor do I wish to take the position that any condemnation statute now on the books needs to be amended. But the testimony, which has been presented to the Banking and Currency Committee, on the effects on individuals and businesses of the widespread land acquisitions under Federal programs convinces me that this matter should be thoroughly reviewed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2802) to provide for a comprehensive study of the disposition of claims for just compensation for persons affected by the acquisition of property by the United States or under Federal programs through condemnation proceedings or otherwise, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ISSUANCE OF GOLD MEDAL IN RECOGNITION OF SERVICES OF DR. THOMAS A. DOOLEY

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to present to Dr. Thomas A. Dooley III, in the name of Congress, a gold medal in recognition of his heroic services to the peoples of Laos and other newly developing countries. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution may be printed at this point in the RECORD, and that the joint resolution lie at the desk until Tuesday of next week so that other Senators may become cosponsors if they so desire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD, and held at the desk, as requested by the Senator from Connecticut.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 148) to authorize the President of the United States to confer a medal on Dr. Thomas Anthony Dooley III, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in recognition of the gallant and unselfish public service rendered by Dr. Thomas Anthony Dooley III, in serving the medical needs of the people of Laos living in the remote areas of the Laotian jungles, and of peoples in other newly developing countries, the President of the United States is authorized to present to Dr. Thomas Anthony Dooley III, in the name of Congress, an appropriate gold medal. For such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be struck a gold medal with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions to be determined by the Secretary. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,500 for this purpose.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause duplicates in bronze of such medal to be coined and sold, under such regulations as he may prescribe, at a price sufficient to cover the cost thereof (including labor), and the appropriations used for carrying out the provisions of this section shall be reimbursed out of the proceeds of such sale.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, Dr. Dooley's private crusade to help his fellow man has captured the imagination of the free world. His dedication and his determination to fight disease and ignorance in newly developing countries is one of the great humanitarian efforts of our time.

A part of this may be found by reading Dr. Dooley's books, which are available at the Library of Congress, under the titles, "The Edge of Tomorrow"—1958, and "Deliver Us From Evil"—1956.

Much has been accomplished by this inspired man within a few years. In 1954, Dr. Dooley participated in the U.S. Navy effort to evacuate over 600,000 refugees from Communist encroachment in North Vietnam. He became so appalled at the stark poverty and misery of the thousands of refugees, that he decided to devote his entire energies in bringing them medical assistance.

His successful program in Laos has led to the establishment of medical centers in other parts of the world. He set up a nonprofit voluntary organization known as Medico, which promotes the establishment of medical centers in places where medical care is nonexistent. Medico already has medical teams in Cambodia, Vietnam, Kenya, Belgian Congo, Jordan, Peru, and Haiti.

Through a recent personal fund-raising effort, Dr. Dooley has obtained enough private subscriptions to Medico to enable him to plan the establishment of medical services in 23 countries where governments have requested teams of medical specialists.

Communist propagandists have vilified Dr. Dooley, but those among whom he works refer to him with affection as "Dr. America." He has done much to create good will for America, particularly among the uncommitted countries of the world.

Dr. Dooley seeks no Government grant in connection with his work, nor is he solicitous of any personal aggrandizement.

In recognition of his unselfish public service and his great spirit of humanitarianism, I propose that Dr. Dooley be given a national award symbolic of the respect and admiration of his fellow Americans.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I shall be glad to yield, if I may.

Mr. JAVITS. I know Dr. Dooley. I admire him greatly. I would like the privilege of joining in sponsorship of the joint resolution, which I think the Senator from Connecticut has taken splendid initiative in introducing today.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask that it be noted that the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] joins in sponsorship of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONVENTION WITH CUBA FOR CONSERVATION OF SHRIMP—CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on September 12, 1959, there was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a letter from the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Douglas Dillon, to the President of the Senate, submitting a draft bill, "to give effect to the Convention between the United States of America and Cuba for the Conservation of Shrimp, signed at Habana, August 15, 1958."

I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from further consideration of the message and that the message be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTION ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. PROUTY submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KEFAUVER submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HENNINGS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. KEATING) submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 2436, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT JUDGES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I submit amendments, intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 2673) to provide for the appointment of additional circuit and district judges, and for other purposes, which is Calendar No. 1045.

These amendments, Mr. President, would amend Senate bill 2673 so as to provide for an additional Federal district judge in the district of Massachusetts, raising from five to six the total number of judges authorized.

Since September 1956 the Judicial Conference has recommended an additional permanent judgeship for this district both to meet the heavy caseload and to bring all of the dockets of the court to a current status. The civil caseload in Massachusetts is well above the national average and in many instances litigants and the Government are forced to wait excessive periods before a case is brought to trial. I ask unanimous consent that a memorandum which has been prepared for me by Joseph F. Spaniol, Jr., in the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, be printed, with tables attached, explaining the necessity for this additional permanent judgeship.

The efficient and orderly disposition of cases before the courts in Massachusetts demands that Congress include this district in its omnibus bill for permanent judgeships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table; and, without objection, the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The memorandum presented by Mr. SALTONSTALL is as follows:

THE JUDICIAL BUSINESS OF THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS

The district of Massachusetts has five judges all of whom reside in Boston and hold court in that city. From time to time trials have been held in Springfield, when there was sufficient business to warrant a term of court there. The last judgeship for the district was established in 1954. There have been no vacancies in office of any duration in the last 15 years, although one of the judges has been disabled by a heart condition which has kept him away from the court on various occasions.

In the years since the Second World War the civil business of the district has mounted steadily. In 1957 the private civil caseload reached a peak of 894 cases compared with 331 in 1941. Last year, however, as the result of the new statute curtailing the jurisdiction of the district courts in diversity of citizenship and certain Federal question cases, the private civil caseload decreased almost 30 percent from 831 in fiscal 1958 to 581 in fiscal 1959. On the other hand, suits to which the Government was a party increased from 596 to 645 and the criminal caseload of 216 cases in 1959 was about the same as the 227 cases commenced in 1958.

But even with the decrease in civil filings, the civil caseload per judgeship in Massachusetts remains well above the national average. In fiscal 1959 the total civil cases commenced per judgeship were 245 compared with 215 civil cases commenced per judgeship nationally. The criminal caseload, except for certain protracted cases, has always been light in this district. In fiscal 1959, there were 42 criminal cases begun per judgeship compared with the national average of 108 cases per judgeship.

Reduced civil filings in 1959 have enabled the court to cut down somewhat on the backlog of civil cases from 1,658 on June 30, 1958, to 1,495 on June 30, 1959. Numerically the reduction amounted to 163 cases, or a little less than 10 percent of the total pending backlog.

The delay in getting cases to trial because of the sizable backlog is shown by the time requisite for the trial and disposition of cases terminated after trial in 1959. The median time interval from filing to disposition was 14.5 months, a little less than the national median time interval of 15.3 months. The median time from issue to trial of 13.1 months, however, was greatly in excess of the national median of 10.3 months.

As compared with the desirable interval of 6 months from the time of the filing of the average civil case until trial, as suggested by the Judicial Conference of the United States, half of the civil cases tried in the district of Massachusetts in fiscal 1959 had been pending more than 13½ months at the time of trial.

The Judicial Conference of the United States first recommended an additional permanent judgeship for this district in September 1956, both to cope with the heavy caseload and to bring all of the dockets of the court to a current status within a reasonable period.

Complete statistical tables showing the judicial business of the district for the last 19 years are attached.

Respectfully submitted,

JOSEPH F. SPANIOL, Jr.,
Attorney, Division of Procedural Studies and Statistics, Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts

JANUARY 12, 1960.

[1] Price and rent control cases are separately listed from 1943 to 1953. In many of these years they constituted a large proportion of all civil cases commenced, although they required on the average a relatively small proportion of court time per case for disposition. They are included in the figure which they follow.

[1] The median time interval in months is computed for the civil cases in which a trial was held, which were terminated during the year, excluding land condemnation, habeas corpus, and forfeiture proceedings. No median interval is shown for the years 1945 through 1952 where less than 25 cases were terminated after trial. For the year 1953 and subsequent years, where there were less than 25 cases terminated after trial, a median is listed with an asterisk (*) on the basis of the number of cases terminated after trial for the last 2 years, provided there were 25 such cases for the 2 years.

NOTICE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to announce that on Wednesday, January 20, 1960, at 10:30 a.m. in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, the Committee on Foreign Relations will hold a public hearing on four conventions and an optional protocol on the law of the sea.

These items are as follows: Executive J, "A Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone"; Executive K, "A Convention on the High Seas"; Executive L, "A Convention on Fishing and Conservation of the Living Resources of the High Seas"; Executive M, "A Convention on the Continental Shelf"; Executive N, "An Optional Protocol of Signature Concerning the Compulsory Settlement of Disputes."

These conventions and the protocol were formulated at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, held at Geneva from February 24 to April 27, 1958. They were signed on behalf of the United States on September 15, 1958, and on behalf of a number of other states. They were transmitted to the Senate by the President on September 9, 1959.

Persons interested in presenting their views on this subject should notify the clerk of the committee.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS ON RIVERS AND HARBORS—AMENDMENT

Mr. MOSS submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H.R. 7634) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for navigation, flood control, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL AND WATER RESOURCES OF WYOMING (S. DOC. NO. 76)

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the document entitled "Mineral and Water Resources of Wyoming," prepared by the staff of the United States Geological Survey, printed as a Senate document, with illustrations. In view of the concern of the Senate, as demonstrated by the adoption of Senate Resolution 48, and the subsequent work of the Senate Select Committee on National Water Resources, of which I am a member, I think the distribution of this study as a Senate document would be highly appropriate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DISCLOSURE OF FINANCE CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH EXTENSIONS OF CREDIT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the orders of the Senate of January 7 and January 13, 1960, the names of Senators NEUBERGER, MORSE, BUSH, HUMPHREY, MUSKIE, YARBOROUGH, CLARK, LONG of Hawaii, GRUENING, MOSS, CHURCH, JACKSON, and KEFAUVER, were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 2755) to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. LONG of Louisiana, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. ENGLE) on January 7, 1960.

AIR CARGO TRANSPORTATION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 11, 1960, the name of Senator SYMINGTON was added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 2774) to foster the national defense, the Postal Service, the development of civil aeronautics, air commerce in the United States and abroad, and for other purposes, by providing for Government guaranty of loans to certain air carriers for purchase of efficient, newly developed, modern cargo aircraft and components of a cargo airlift system, introduced by Mr. MONRONEY on January 11, 1960.

CONVENTION OF DELEGATES FROM ATLANTIC DEMOCRACIES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] be added as a cosponsor to a resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, which I submitted last year on behalf of myself and other Senators, in support of a convention of delegates from Atlantic democracies looking to greater cooperation and unity of purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF THOMAS W. S. DAVIS TO BE A MEMBER OF THE FOREIGN SETTLEMENT COMMISSION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for 10:30 a.m., Wednesday, January 20, 1960, in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, on the nomination of Thomas W. S. Davis, of Virginia, to be a member of the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission of the United States, vice Whitney Gillilland, resigned.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the above nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]; the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA]; and myself, as chairman.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF JAMES R. DURFEE, TO BE ASSOCIATE JUDGE OF THE U.S. COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for 10:30 a.m., Thursday, January 21, 1960, in room 2228, New Senate Office Building, on the nomination of James R. Durfee, of Wisconsin, to be associate judge of the U.S. Court of Claims, vice Benjamin H. Littleton, retired.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the above nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]; the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]; and myself, as chairman.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF HEARINGS BY THE COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make an announcement of committee hearings.

I wish to announce that on Monday next, January 18, the Committee on Rules and Administration will begin hearings on the subject of temporary Federal election registrars. The hearings will continue on the 19th and 21st and will be held in the auditorium of the New Senate Office Building, room G–308, beginning at 10:30 a.m. each day. The hearings will probably be continued into the following week. The committee has not determined these dates as yet.

Three bills dealing with this subject have been referred to the Rules Committee. These bills are S. 2684, 2719, and 2783. In addition, there are two other bills related to this subject which have been referred to the committee, S. 2535 and S. 2722.

Since some of these legislative proposals have bearing on the civil rights legislation which the majority leader has indicated will be called up for action in the Senate in the middle or latter part of February, it seems urgent for this reason, as well as a proper consideration of these bills on their own merits, that our committee schedule the necessary hearings as soon as possible.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights in its report issued September 9, 1959, recommended legislation concerning the appointment of temporary Federal registrars. Having this in mind the committee hoped originally to commence the hearings with the testimony of the distinguished Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Dr. John A. Hannah, president of the Michigan State University; the Vice Chairman of the Commission, Dean Robert G. Storey, of Southern Methodist University Law School; and the Honorable John S. Battle, a distinguished former Governor of Virginia, who dissented from the recommendations of the Commission concerning this subject. Because of a meeting of the Joint Defense Board in Florida the next day, Dr. Hannah has informed us he will be unable to attend, but that the Commission's views will be fully presented by Dean Storey. Dr. Hannah has agreed to appear at a later date. I hope to hear within a day or two that Governor Battle will be able to accept our urgent invitation that he present his dissenting views to the committee.

Beginning on the 19th, the committee plans first to hear from those Senators who have introduced bills on this subject referred to the committee and then from other Senators who wish to present their views and then from other informed and interested witnesses.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia:

Address delivered by him in Chicago on December 15, 1959, before the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Correspondence between him and the Secretary of Commerce in regard to the Federal highway program.

By Mr. MANSFIELD:

Address entitled "The Obligations of Freedom," delivered by Senator RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, to Veterans of Foreign Wars, Post 629, Fairmont, W. Va., January 10, 1960.

By Mr. SCOTT:

Article by him relating to Adlai Stevenson's attitude toward Red China, and editorial from the United Daily News, of Taipei, Formosa, of December 19, 1959.

By Mr. CLARK:

Article entitled "Security With Solvency," written by Senator SYMINGTON and published in the November 26 issue of Reporter magazine.

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

Address dealing with the international cultural exchange program, delivered by Representative FRANK THOMPSON, JR., of New Jersey, before the American Educational Theater Association.

FRED FLORENCE, TEXAS CIVIC LEADER, AWARDED PAPAL MEDAL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, during the time the Congress was in adjournment, a distinguished Texas civic leader, Mr. Fred F. Florence, of Dallas, received the highest award the Roman Catholic Church can bestow on a nonmember.

The award received by Mr. Florence is the gold Benemerenti Medal. The word "benemerenti" means "one deserving well." All who know, as I am privileged to know, of Fred Florence's unselfish service to humanity realize that here, indeed, is a man who deserves well.

Mr. Florence was singled out by Pope John XXIII to receive the medal because of his longtime efforts on behalf of community projects, and especially his support of Catholic institutions in the diocese of Dallas-Fort Worth. His name is synonymous with civic work in the Dallas area.

Mr. Florence is chairman of the executive committee of the Republic National Bank of Dallas. He is past president of the American Bankers Association, the Texas Bankers Association, and the Dallas Clearing House Association.

On behalf of Pope John, Bishop Thomas K. Gorman, of the Dallas-Fort Worth diocese, presented the Benemerenti Medal to Mr. Florence at a banquet in Dallas largely attended by citizens who have an intimate knowledge of the man and his works.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Bishop Gorman's remarks and the citation awarding the Benemerenti Medal to Mr. Florence be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY BISHOP THOMAS K. GORMAN ON OCCASION OF THE PRESENTATION OF THE BENEMERENTI MEDAL TO FRED FARREL FLORENCE—SEPTEMBER 15, 1959

Esteemed honoree, distinguished guests, a very happy purpose has summoned us to break bread together this evening. We have come to witness the bestowal of a decoration of merit upon an admired leader in our community, Fred Farrel Florence. This well-deserved honor naturally points directly to the well-known merits of our honoree, yet I think you will agree with me when I say it goes beyond merely personal greatness of a great leader to achieve a truly community-wide significance. Will you not bear with me for a few minutes, therefore, while I strive to point out why Pope John XXIII, in honoring one of our leaders in the person of Fred Florence has recognized the stalwart character and effectiveness for good of the type of leadership with which the community of Dallas is blessed.

A city, be it large or small, may enjoy an important place in the world for a variety of reasons. It may have had a rich and varied history through the centuries, during which it contributed to the development of our civilization. It may have been and still continues to be the center of great institutions of national and world importance, civic, artistic, scientific, educational, recreational, industrial, religious. It may be a center possessing vital potential necessary for the growth and development of all these things in the years that lie ahead.

A city, too, may be powerful for a variety of reasons. Its geographical situation can give it enormous strategic advantages. It may be the center of a powerful political entity. It may possess enormous population, supported by great agricultural, mineral, industrial, and banking operations. All these things and many others of a material nature make for growth, wealth, power.

Yet, my friends, you and I well realize that a great city with all these resources may still be a destructive, materialistic brute, unless possessed of an ennobling, vivifying soul. Such a soul it gets and can only get from the spiritual, humanitarian leadership of the citizens who direct its destinies toward the common good and the noble life.

Our Dallas has grown important and powerful and great in the finest sense because it has such a soul breathed into it by its first citizens. Many who have had a hand in creating this living, vital, human city, I see here before me tonight. They and their fellows in the work of forming the soul of Dallas, of making the community a good place in which to live and work and play and worship may well view with pride the honor that comes tonight to one of their fellow Dallas soul builders, a coworker in the magnificent program through the years to create the spirit that is Dallas.

What need for me to retail here for you the lifelong services rendered by Fred Florence to this community in business and banking, in civic and charitable welfare. You know the stature he has achieved in his chosen banking field, both locally, statewide and nationally. You are aware of his services to various projects for our industrial and business development. You know well his untiring labors on behalf of the Community Chest, the National Foundation, Southern Methodist University, the State Fair of Texas, and the Texas Research Foundation. He is an active member, too, of the Congregation of Temple Emanu-El, which he serves as a member of its board of directors and treasurer.

What I do want especially emphasized here tonight, as giving point to this gathering and the presentation to follow, are the many years and understanding and generous cooperation with our Catholic educational, charitable, and welfare activities by Fred Florence.

Through the years his has been warm friendship for Mother Clement and a helpful, generous cooperation with Mount St. Michael and the program of the sisters there for underprivileged girls.

Fred Florence serves as chairman of the lay advisory board of St. Paul's Hospital. He it was who, in cooperation with Karl Hoblitzelle, a previous Dallas recipient of the Benemerenti Medal, laid the early foundation, stimulated the community interest, and led an enthusiastic group of civic leaders to the successful completion of the campaign for funds to build the new St. Pauls Hospital, one of the most effective and fruitful fund-raising efforts in the history of this community.

Mr. Florence and his family visited Rome a little over a year ago. They were received in private audience by Pope Pius XII, just a few months before his death. It was to the late Holy Father that the civic and charitable merits of our honoree were pointed out. He died before he could act in the matter and thus there was delay while new medals were being designed and struck. Thus the citation comes from John XXIII and bears his friendly likeness rather than that of the inspiring Pius XII whom Fred had met.

It may be of interest to note that Fred Florence is surely among the first, if not the first, in the United States or anywhere to receive the Benemerenti Medal of the reign of the dynamic John XXIII.

Fred Farrel Florence, it now becomes my honor and privilege, standing a friend among your friends and associates, your fellow creators of the soul that is Dallas, to read the citation and present the medal indicating that you are deemed to merit well by the practice of civic, charitable, and religious virtues to so notable a degree. We are, therefore, pleased to join Pope John XXIII in felicitating you and praying for you and your dear ones many long years of health, happiness, and prosperity.

THE CITATION

"His Holiness Pope John XXIII has deigned to decree and to bestow upon Mr. Fred Florence the gold medal established for one who merits especially well with regard to affairs of the church and gives to the same the faculty of adorning himself with this decoration."

THIRTEEN NATION CONFERENCE ON PROBLEMS OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a momentous 13 Nation Conference, of vital interest to the United States at a critical time in its trade and political history, opened in Paris yesterday, at which Mr. Dillon, our Under Secretary of State, is comporting himself with distinction.

The nations present are: Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States.

The Conference is dealing with two questions:

First. The problems created for international trade, and indeed for Western unity, by the existence of two economic entities in Europe, the Inner Six, consisting of Germany, France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg; and the European Free Trade Association, the Outer Seven, consisting of Britain, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Austria, Switzerland, and Portugal.

Second. The need for accelerating the free world effort to aid the newly developing nations and areas by increasing economic aid and technical assistance—beyond that now afforded bilaterally by the United States and other countries, multilaterally through the United Nations, and through other international agencies like the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and the International Finance Corporation.

For this effort, the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference, to which the Congress adheres, and which held its fifth annual conference in Washington last November, is heavily responsible. Specific resolutions of the Conference were adopted at its plenary session in Washington on November 20, 1959, on these two subjects, upon the recommendations of the Conference's Economic Committee, of which I had the honor to be the Chairman, and of which the other U.S. delegation member was Representative PETER FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the resolutions be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATO PARLIAMENTARIANS' CONFERENCE—FIFTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, ECONOMIC COMMITTEE RESOLUTIONS

RESOLUTION 1

Resolved, That pending further consideration of a NATO Economic Council or an Organization for Atlantic Economic Cooperation the member countries should achieve within the framework of the OEEC more effective coordination of their economic policies and programs based on the existing groupings of the European Economic Community, the proposed European Free Trade Association, and the United States and Canada as represented in the North American Ministerial Committee on Economic Problems.

RESOLUTION 2

The NATO Parliamentarians' Conference recommends:

That no new barriers to trade be allowed to rise between member countries of NATO;

That the six member countries of the European Economic Community develop an understanding with the other Western countries envisaging an outward-looking solution of trade problems with Western Europe and North America; and

That governments should work to assure the development of harmonious relations between member countries of NATO and the creation of conditions which would serve to expand international trade.

RESOLUTION 3

Resolved, That urgent attention should be given to the problems of underdeveloped regions in the NATO countries and that the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference recommend to the European Economic Community and the proposed European Free Trade Association that the improvement of the economy of these regions should be a prime consideration in their present and continuing negotiations and in their activities.

RESOLUTION 4

The NATO Parliamentarians' Conference—

(i) Emphasizes that the accelerated development of the less developed areas throughout the world is a proper and desirable concern of the industrialized countries;

(ii) Considers that acceptable progress in the further development of the less developed areas requires the NATO countries and other more developed countries to do more than they are doing now to help accelerate such further development;

(iii) Calls attention to recent studies of the less developed areas, the present efforts of the economically more developed countries to help in such development and their capabilities to do so, and recommends that a definitive assessment should be urgently carried out with a view to formulating a program, which will command the support and the active participation of all the countries of the free world, as determined in detail by a commission of outstanding independent economists convened by the OEEC from both the developed and the less developed countries; and

(iv) Notes with approval the proposed establishment of an International Development Association.

RESOLUTION 5

Resolved, That the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference endorse the initiative of the OEEC in undertaking studies concerned with an International Convention for the Protection of Foreign Investments to be adhered to by all member countries, and consider such code or declaration to be highly desirable in the encouragement of private investment in the less developed areas, and offer its assistance and cooperation in the promulgation of such a code or declaration.

RESOLUTION 6

Resolved, That the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference welcome the increase in the resources of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and urge member governments to meet rapidly their commitments to the Fund and the Bank.

RESOLUTION 7

The NATO Parliamentarians' Conference recommends that, to take full advantage of the U.S. Government's undertaking to contribute 40 percent to the United Nations Special Fund and the expanded program of technical assistance, and to bring the resources of these programs to $100 million, the member countries should make their proper contributions to the Special Fund.

RESOLUTION 8

Resolved, That the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference—

(i) Recommend that the member governments of NATO investigate what additional ad hoc assistance it may be possible to give to producing countries facing difficulties in respect of their particular primary commodities through structural market changes or technological advances which may necessitate some form of adjustment assistance;

(ii) Urge the member governments to investigate what can be done in the field of primary commodity markets stabilization, bearing in mind also the work of GATT and the various schemes described in the U.N. World Economic Survey; and

(iii) Emphasize the economic and security interests of the NATO countries in the stabilization of primary commodity prices and supplies.

RESOLUTION 9

Resolved, That, following the conclusions of the Atlantic Congress, the NATO Parliamentarians' Conference recommend that the NATO countries give watchful attention to any international trading activities which may constitute dumping, intentional disruption of markets, or economic warfare; and further

Resolved, That the NATO countries should be guided by the principles of the GATT, as criteria to determine whether activities of such a nature are taking place; and further resolved that the NATO countries through the Committee of Economic Advisers consider what further measures might be needed to insure against the effects of such activities.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the other U.S. delegation members were Representative FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey, Representative SELDEN, of Alabama, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], all of whom are close friends of many of us.

It must be recognized that unlike certain other diplomatic negotiations, this Congress and the parliaments of the other NATO countries are deeply concerned with the conference in Paris. Whatever is done in Paris will either require legislation or will have a material impact upon legislation which we will be considering. It is extremely important, therefore, that from the very outset Congress be fully informed as to the negotiations and the proposals which result and be kept in the closest touch with what is taking place. The effort is so significant for world trade and economic relations, too, that through their parliaments the peoples of the respective countries need to have a very material and direct knowledge of what is taking place.

What is done in Paris will have a direct and perhaps even immediate economic effect upon us, too. For many years the United States enjoyed a favorable trade balance. In 1958 and 1959, the drain on the U.S. gold reserve totaled $3.2 billion. The time has come to stem this outflow. There are several ways to accomplish this end:

First. European customers should reduce their remaining protective trade barriers against the United States;

Second. The United States should accelerate its efforts to sell its products abroad by greater productivity, greater efficiency, by longer term credit, by better salesmanship, by superior goods;

Third. Accelerating the development to newly developing areas;

Fourth. Developing new capital sources in partnership with the other free world industrial countries.

The new challenge facing the NATO alliance is to give it depth and content as we are phasing out of the cold war and into the economic struggle, and the corollary weapons competition between the free world and the Communist bloc, which is likely to distinguished the decade of the 1960's. This will call for a reevaluation of the role of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation and perhaps its reorganization; it will also call for acceptance by the NATO parliaments and the publics of the NATO countries of support for some form of economic integration between the European Common Market and the European Free Trade Association, and the North American members of the alliance, the United States and Canada.

Best wishes for success go today to Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon and the representatives of the United States in Paris in their vital mission.

Mr. President, I desire to speak upon another subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

ALIEN ORPHANS' BILL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the program by which American families have been able to adopt alien orphans has been one of the important humanitarian services developed out of the miseries of World War II. Ways and means are presently being discussed and explored whereby the program can be continued on a permanent basis under which alien orphans less than 14 years of age who have been adopted or will be upon their admission to the United States are granted nonquota immigrant status.

Under proposed legislation which I introduced last year, extension was assured until June 30, 1960, of the statutory authority for the admission of these orphans, namely Public Law 85–316, approved September 11, 1957.

I have participated actively in regard to legislation assuring continuation of this program for many years, first as a Member of the House of Representatives and more recently as a Member of the Senate. The alien orphans' program was begun as a part of the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 and has been extended by the act of July 29, 1953, the Refugee Relief Act of 1953, Public Law 85–316 and Public Law 86–253. It has enriched the lives of thousands of childless American couples and brought happiness and a chance for full productive lives as Americans to the parentless waifs whom they have adopted.

Regrettably, certain unforeseen abuses in this highly commendable program developed as the result of the activities of a few unscrupulous and irresponsible persons. It has therefore been found desirable to establish safeguards to prevent commercialism in proxy adoptions and also in assuring that the prospective adoptive parents are fit persons.

I have encouraged study in the jurisdictional and other problems involved to the end that measures which will have the effect of eliminating the undesirable results under Public Law 85–316 will be formulated. I am happy to report that substantial progress has been made.

I am hopeful that a solution which meets the needs and requirements of all interested parties will be reached in the very near future.

I expect I shall soon be able to introduce appropriate proposed legislation so that this program can then be made a permanent part of our law.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

GEORGE WALBRIDGE PERKINS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of my colleagues to the passing of a very dear friend, a great American and an outstanding public servant, George Walbridge Perkins of New York, whom I had the honor to know for more than 15 years and who served with me in the Army as an officer in the Chemical Corps.

By President Eisenhower's appointment Mr. Perkins became the U.S. permanent representative, with the rank of Ambassador, on the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in 1955. He was an Assistant Secretary of State who rendered unusual and outstanding service in the administration's policy regarding the Soviet Union and in our relations with nations behind the Iron Curtain.

Mr. Perkins also saw action as a colonel in Europe and in the Pacific, receiving the Legion of Merit medal for his war service. He was a director in the Industry Division of the Economic Cooperation Administration in Paris and served the United States in the formation of NATO in its early stages. He had a luminous career, but was taken from us at the relatively young age of 64.

I feel my colleagues would wish to have the passing of a citizen of such distinction, who has served so ably and effectively as a businessman—he was a leading executive of Merck & Co. for many years—as a statesman, as a representative of our country diplomatically, and as a soldier, signalized to them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the obituary notices from the New York Times and from the New York Herald Tribune be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the obituaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 12, 1960]

GEORGE PERKINS, EX-U.S. AID, DIES—ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE, 1949–53, SERVED NATO—HAD BEEN MERCK OFFICIAL

George Walbridge Perkins of 1 East 66th Street, former Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs, died Sunday at home of a heart attack. His age was 64.

Mr. Perkins, a Republican, was appointed to the post by former President Harry S. Truman in 1949. He served until 1953.

In 1955, President Eisenhower appointed Mr. Perkins U.S. permanent representative with the rank of Ambassador on the Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. He was succeeded on the Council in 1957 by W. Randolph Burgess.

That year Mr. Perkins, who had become associated with Merck & Co. in 1927, returned to the concern as a director. He was executive vice president of the Merck organization and a director of its Canadian subsidiary when he received a leave of absence in 1942 to serve with the Chemical Warfare Service of the Army.

Mr. Perkins saw action as a colonel in Europe and the Pacific and received the Legion of Merit for his war service. He returned to Merck in 1945.

Three years later he severed affiliations with Merck to accept an appointment as director of the industry division of the Economic Cooperation Administration in Paris. A year later, as an Assistant Secretary of State, he was the U.S. representative in the formation of NATO.

ADVISER TO ACHESON

Mr. Perkins also aided the administration's policy regarding the Soviet Union and other countries behind the Iron Curtain. He served as adviser to former Secretary of State Dean Acheson at several international meetings of foreign ministers.

He is said to have started this country's friendlier attitude toward Spain. He announced the new official policy to a group of labor leaders at a luncheon in Washington in 1950, explaining that it would not mean approval of the Franco regime.

He also helped to win from Congress financial aid for Yugoslavia in 1950. He explained then that the grant from the United States would be a weapon of economic warfare against the Soviet Union.

Mr. Perkins was born in Riverdale, the Bronx, on May 2, 1895. He attended the Hill School in Pottstown, Pa., and graduated from Princeton University in 1917. On his return from service with the Army in World War I, he became executive secretary of the Princeton Endowment Fund Committee. In 1921 he received a master's degree from Columbia University.

Later that year he went to Washington as executive secretary to the Postmaster General. In 1922 Mr. Perkins was named assistant treasurer of the Republican State Committee of New York.

SERVED PALISADES COMMISSION

At his death Mr. Perkins was president of the Palisades Interstate Park Commission, of which he had been a member since 1922. He was a trustee of the Hill School and Robert College in Istanbul, Turkey, and a former trustee of Princeton. He had been president of the New York Presbyterian Foundation and of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York.

He was a former director of the City Bank Farmers Trust Co. He belonged to the University, Union League, and Princeton Clubs in New York and the Down Town and Century Associations.

Mr. Perkins also had a home in Cold Spring, N.Y., where he had served as president of the board of education.

He is survived by his widow, the former Linn Merck; a son, George W., Jr., of Millbrook, N.Y.; two daughters, Mrs. William B. Wilson of West Chester, Pa., and Mrs. Francis H. Cabot of New York; his mother, and a sister. His first wife, the former Katharine Trowbridge, whom he married in 1917, died a year later while he was serving in France.

A funeral service for Mr. Perkins will be held tomorrow at 11 a.m. in the Brick Presbyterian Church. The Reverend Dr. Henry P. van Dusen, president of the Union Theological Seminary, and the Reverend Stanley E. Niebruegge of the Brick Church will officiate.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 12, 1960]

GEORGE W. PERKINS DEAD, EX-OFFICIAL IN STATE DEPARTMENT

George W. Perkins, 64, former executive vice president and director of Merck & Co., Inc., chemical manufacturers, and an Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs in former President Truman's administration, died Sunday at his home at 1 East 66th Street.

Born in Riverdale-on-Hudson, N.Y., Mr. Perkins attended Hill School and was graduated from Princeton University in 1917. The following 2 years he served as a private, regimental supply sergeant and second lieutenant with the 1st Army Division in France.

In 1920 he returned to civilian life to take graduate studies at Columbia University's Teachers College, where he received a master's degree. That same year he became a director of the Boy Scouts Federation of New York and in 1921 was made an honorary vice president of the Honest Ballot Association.

HEADED YOUNG REPUBLICANS

Active in Republican politics, Mr. Perkins in 1922 was assistant treasurer of the New York State Republican Committee and president of the New York Young Republican Club. He also was made secretary of the Palisades Interstate Park Commission. He became president of the commission in 1945.

In World War II, Mr. Perkins served in the Army Chemical Warfare Service as a colonel in both the European and Pacific theaters. When he again returned to civilian life he became chief of the industries division of the Economic Cooperation Administration in Paris in 1948 with the rank of Ambassador. In 1949 he became Secretary of State for European Affairs and served until the end of the Truman administration.

ACTIVE IN CHURCH, YMCA

Mr. Perkins was associated in an executive capacity with Merck & Co. from 1927 through 1948. He was active in the Presbyterian Church in New York and was a member of the board of managers of the Bronx Union branch of the New York City YMCA. From 1923 to 1945 he served on the church extension committee of the Presbytery of New York.

He also interested himself in overseas educational programs. He was a member of the finance committee of Robert College in Turkey and a vice president and member of the executive committee of the Near East College Association.

Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Lima M. Perkins; a son, George W. Perkins, Jr.; two daughters, Mrs. William B. Wilson and Mrs. Francis H. Cabot; his mother, Mrs. George W. Perkins, Sr., and a sister, Mrs. Edward W. Freeman.

A funeral service will be held at 11 a.m., tomorrow at the Brick Presbyterian Church, Park Avenue and 91st Street.

VOTING RIGHTS OF NEGROES IN LOUISIANA

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on Monday, the U.S. District Court for Louisiana handed down a historic and far-reaching decision—the first positive result of the powers given the Attorney General under the Civil Rights Act of 1957—when Judge J. Skelly Wright ordered the restoration of 1,377 Negroes to the voting rolls of the State. The effort by which these voters, long qualified to participate, had been struck from the rolls through the efforts of a citizens' council shows exactly why we need law to back up the other such efforts to assure that people shall enjoy such civil rights as voting.

In an editorial appearing today, the New York Times makes it clear that this important step must be followed by effective legislation when the Senate proceeds to the consideration of civil rights bills next month. Certainly a most effective means for assuring the consideration of such legislation in its proper parliamentary framework would be passage by the House of the bill now bottled up in the Rules Committee, and I again urge the members of my party to join in making this possible.

I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial from this morning's New York Times printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO GREATER OFFENSE

Restoration to the voting rolls of 1,377 Negroes in a Louisiana parish by order of a Federal court is the first positive result of the Civil Rights Act of 1957. After this it will be impossible to say that the power given under this law to the Attorney General to institute civil suits to protect voting rights is ineffective or meaningless. The law certainly does not yet go far enough to insure the quality of citizenship that the American system demands; but it does represent a forward step—which must and will be followed by other and larger steps in the same direction.

Just what Congress proposes to do about additional civil rights legislation at this preelection session is not yet clear. Majority Leader JOHNSON is committed to bringing up a bill next month; the question is: What bill? A moderate civil rights bill was reported by the House Judiciary Committee last summer and has been pigeonholed since then in the Rules Committee. If it should be forced out by petition (or by politics) and passed by the House in the next few weeks, the Senate would have something to go on—not much, to be sure, but better than the nothing it will get from its own Judiciary Committee headed by Senator EASTLAND.

The Civil Rights Commission made its contribution to the picture in its report last September, recommending that Federal registrars be used to insure Negro voting rights where necessary; but the President gave this idea scant backing in his state of the Union message the other day, urging merely that Congress "seriously" consider this along with his own previous, less far-reaching, proposals.

Meanwhile, the decision in Federal district court in New Orleans by Judge J. Skelly Wright will stand as a minor landmark in the long struggle to gain the franchise for Negroes even in the Deep South. Judge Wright held that the 1,377 Negroes purged from the registration rolls were clearly victims of racial discrimination; and he has taken unusual judicial steps to insure that future registrations in the affected parish are untainted by racialism. "In a democratic society," this vigorous judge points out, "there is no greater offense than illegally depriving a citizen of his right to vote." The Citizens Councils of Louisiana and elsewhere ought to take these words to heart.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES MERIT A PAY INCREASE BASED ON ADMINISTRATION-SPONSORED PAY RAISE FOR STEELWORKERS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on January 11, 1960, a letter was addressed by me to the Chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission asking what plans are underway by the Eisenhower Administration to provide pay increases for Federal employees generally and for employees of the Post Office Department.

My inquiry was prompted by the very generous wage and fringe-benefit increases recently sponsored by high officials of the administration for the steelworkers, who already were among the highest paid industrial workers in the Nation.

Any valid comparison of the wages received by steelworkers and Federal employees will demonstrate the greater average earnings of steelworkers.

STEELWORKERS EARN MORE THAN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

In 1958 the average steel production employee earned $5,616, as contrasted with $5,193 for the average Federal employee and only $4,809 for the average employee of the U.S. Post Office Department. Furthermore, the pay of steel production employees has increased some 127 percent since 1946, as compared with 94 percent for all Federal employees and but 77 percent for postal employees.

On top of this, many leading authorities believe that the settlement reached in steel will add to the inflation in consumer prices generally, and of course this will affect Federal employees and all other people in the Nation. In its issue of January 18, U.S. News & World Report has stated that "steel prices are not to be raised immediately but higher costs are expected to force prices up later. The steel wage boost will affect other industries.

ADMINISTRATION MIGHT FAVOR INCREASE IN PAY FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

And so I have asked the administration what it intends to do for its own employees, now that this same administration has sponsored such substantial gains for the steelworkers. I have voiced the inquiry to the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission in my capacity as the member of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service who held detailed subcommittee hearings several years ago on the entire question of Federal pay scales.

The cost of steel enters into every single item from baby buggies to trolley fares. The wages paid to the steelworkers enter into the cost of steel. Now that the administration has gained the credit for the settlement favoring the steelworkers, can the administration shirk the problem created in other industries and, indeed, in the Federal Government itself? Millions of families will find their pocketbooks and budgets disturbed by the steel settlement, which has gained such plaudits from the Steelworkers Union for the Eisenhower administration officials who negotiated it. But with plaudits come responsibility, and I have asked Chairman Jones of the Civil Service Commission the very simple and direct question of whether or not the administration has any plans for its own Federal Government employees which are parallel to the bonanza discovered by the administration for the steelworkers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD my letter of January 11 to Chairman Roger W. Jones of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, together with the cryptic reply which I have received from the Chairman. I also ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD an excellent article from the New York Times of January 10, 1960, by Joseph A. Loftus, "Steel Accord Stirs Fears of Inflation," which discusses the possible inflationary impact of the recent steel wage settlement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAVITS in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

There being no objection, the letters and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 11, 1960.

Hon. ROGER W. JONES,
Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Now that the administration has taken the lead in sponsoring and promoting a handsome pay increase for the steelworkers, I should like to inquire as to the plans of the administration regarding its own Federal Government employees.

Let me call your attention to the fact that, in 1958, the average steel employee earned $5,616 as contrasted with $5,193 for the average Federal employee and only $4,809 for the average employee of the U.S. Post Office Department. Furthermore, the pay of steelworkers has increased some 127 percent since 1946, as compared with 94 percent for all Federal employees and 77 percent for postal employees.

In view of the administration leadership which resulted in the substantial pay increases recently negotiated for the steelworkers, I naturally assume that this administration has somewhat parallel plans underway for those who serve the administration directly, in the general departments and agencies of Government and in the Post Office particularly. Such a pay increase could be effective July 1, 1960, or January 1, 1961, but in either case would require congressional approval this year.

We must remember that the weapon of the strike, used with such effectiveness by the steelworkers, is not available to men and women who serve the U.S. Government. Yet this does not make any less urgent their problems of supporting their families in a period of ever-increasing living costs. I must again emphasize that the administration has been a good deal less than hesitant in claiming credit for the large wage and fringe-benefit increases recently won by the steelworkers. This certainly places upon the administration an obligation to tell the American public how it proposes, under such circumstances, to treat its own postal workers and other Federal employees.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I shall await with interest your recommendations in this respect. I had assumed that the administration desired to "hold the line" on so-called pay increases. However, in view of the administration's own active role in promoting the very substantial salary increases obtained by the steelworkers, I now presume that Federal employees will receive somewhat similar gains. The cost of steel, after all, is a vital and integral feature of the cost of living of all Americans, including Federal employees.

May I hear from you at an early date?

With all good wishes for the new year, I am,

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
WASHINGTON, D.C.,
January 11, 1960.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: In response to your inquiry of January 11, as to the position which the administration will take with respect to pay raises, it is my understanding that the President will discuss this issue in his budget message, now scheduled for presentation to Congress on January 18.

Sincerely yours,

ROGER W. JONES,
Chairman.

STEEL ACCORD STIRS FEARS OF INFLATION BUT NOT ALL ECONOMISTS AGREE ON THE DEPTH OF ITS IMPACT

(By Joseph A. Loftus)

WASHINGTON, January 9.—President Eisenhower this week compared the nagging specter of inflation to a fire in the old homestead. Everybody, particularly government, must fight it, he told Congress.

Since the war, price inflation has halved the value of the dollar. More recently, the rise has been called a "creep" and many economists accept it as the price of a booming economy.

The Consumer Price Index, loosely called the cost of living fever chart, is the principal indicator of the creep. Except for a pause in the latter half of 1958, the index has moved up slowly but steadily. So with the wholesale price index, if farm products and food are excluded from the count.

Inflation is the consequence of many factors—government spending in excess of income, excessively cheap consumer credit that makes demands on the supply of goods, wasteful work and managerial practices leading to low productivity, and profiteering, to use an old wartime epithet.

The upward pressure of the labor contract is being watched closely by the economists. No contract is considered more important in this context than steel, and the settlement in that industry has prompted a reappraisal of the general outlook.

If the steel companies follow the pattern of their own statistics, prices will go up about $3.75 per ton per year.

This is not a prediction. It is a statistical implication in the speech of Roger M. Blough, chairman of the United States Steel Corp., to the Nation on Monday night. He said that for the last 20 years steel's employment costs have risen an average of 8 percent a year. The price rise of steel averaged 5.5 percent a year.

Since the employment cost rise under the new 3-year labor contract, according to Mr. Blough, will be less than half of the 20-year average, one might conclude that the price rise will be less than half the average, or 2.5 percent a year. The price of steel per ton averages $150. A raise of 2.5 percent would yield $3.75. This is small, as steel price increases have gone in the postwar years.

EMPLOYMENT COST

Any price projection involves assumptions. This projection assumes that 1960–62 will be average years. That could be wrong. Certainly 1960 is expected to be better than average in terms of total production. When production is high, employment cost per unit of output falls.

An assumption that productivity will not rise any faster than it has in the past is probably wrong, certainly for 1960. Data for the first half of 1959, when the mills were running close to capacity show a sharp rise in productivity.

Union cooperation and employee morale are important in the future price picture. As Mr. Blough said in that context, "the steel industry can witness one of the greatest improvements in its productive efficiency that it has known in modern times."

Since foreign steel and substitute products made at home are a threat, as Mr. Blough reported, the steel companies no doubt will consider these factors in making price policies.

So, political angles aside, it is possible that the steel industry will find 1960 so much better than average that it will be able to defer price increases until December 1, when the second step-up in employment costs takes effect. This, too, is no forecast.

STEEL'S EFFECTS

How do steel prices affect the rest of the economy?

In August 1956, Ewan Clague, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, observed that the 6¼-percent rise in steel prices then would have a negligible effect on the Consumer Price Index because the amount of steel in the consumer dollar is tiny.

Prof. Jules Backman of New York University told the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee in 1958 that his analysis "supports Mr. Clague's 1956 appraisal and that conclusion would be equally applicable today."

Not all authorities accept this method of measuring the impact of steel prices.

Otto Eckstein and Gary Fromm, two economists who did a special steel-inflation study for the Joint Economic Committee, said the Consumer Price Index "is particularly poorly suited to reflect the significance of steel."

They noted, for instance, that capital goods are completely excluded from the index, though in the long run they enter into consumer prices. Also excluded are the cost of Government purchases.

Besides, the impact of steel prices on other prices cannot be attributed wholly to the steel industry. About a third of the price increase in steel is attributable to higher prices paid by the steel industry for materials, transportation, and other items purchased from other industries.

Steel prices are sometimes credited with a psychological impact on the economy. As a basic industry, it is thought of as a bellwether. Yet, in the last 7 years the major steel consuming industries have not raised their prices as fast as basic steel prices went up.

The immediate effect of the wage settlement on the stock market was to drive up steel shares. Then these prices fell back, although other considerations appeared to have entered into the drop.

With the threat of another steel strike dissipated, it is hard to see any block to the flow of consumer goods to meet the rising demand.

PRICES HELD

The extent that production costs tend to push up prices, improved productivity (rates of production) will tend to hold down prices. The outlook for this is generally good.

Rising imports, though they may create other problems, will tend to hold down prices.

As the experts hereabouts look ahead, the rise in the general price level, in the next year probably will not exceed 2 percent if it goes that high. In 1959, the Consumer Price Index went up 1.5 percent.

If steel is the key, that forecast surely should stand up. For, to go back to the beginning, the steel settlement is less costly than previous settlements, far less than the 3-year pact made in 1956.

If President Eisenhower's hopes are realized, we will reach June 30, 1961, with a $4,200 million surplus in the Federal till. This is a deflationary force.

Tight money, which seems to be the current policy of the Federal Reserve, tends to brake the spiral, though an excessive use of such a brake could manufacture a recession.

Taken together, the pressures may not entirely dissipate the specter of inflation but the experts are not worrying about anything so real that it will burn the house down.

OUR STAKE IN FOREIGN AID

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the days ahead, Congress will be faced with significant decisions on the direction and scope of the mutual security program.

The program—one of the most controversial in the postwar era—has served, nevertheless, as the foundation for free world efforts to combat communism.

As a unique effort in history by one nation to assist other nations in facing a common enemy, however, the program, unfortunately, has suffered, prestigewise, from the inevitable mistakes of the "trial and error" road.

Despite the difficulties involved in successfully meeting a great challenge, however, mutual security nevertheless has experienced a large degree of success—not only in withstanding the pressure of expansionist communism; but also, to go one step further, in reducing—through economic and technological assistance—the areas of poverty and substandard living which serve as the breeding places for trouble in the world.

Today, changing conditions in the world require adjustments in the program. Particularly, there is a real need for assumption of greater responsibility for assistance to less developed nations by those countries—particularly Western Europe—which are now on their feet economically.

These nations, I believe, can well afford both in their own national, and the free-world interest, to assume greater responsibilities in this field.

Although there is a recognizable need for improvements in the program, however, mutual assistance still continues to be an essential part of our foreign policy.

Recently, the Deputy Director for Operations of the International Cooperation Administration, D. A. FitzGerald, gave an informative address on foreign aid at Marquette University in Milwaukee, Wis., entitled "Our Stake in Foreign Aid."

I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR STAKE IN FOREIGN AID

(Address by D. A. FitzGerald, Deputy Director for Operations, International Cooperation Administration, at the Institute on U.S. Foreign Aid, Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis., December 11, 1959)

The subject which has been assigned to me for this evening is "Our Stake in Foreign Aid." I wish that the mutual security program had no future, that we had no stake in it. The greatest news for all of us would be an announcement by the President that this program could come to an end—that it was no longer needed.

Such an announcement would mean that the military threat to the United States no longer existed; that no defense partner of ours had a larger defense burden than its economy could reasonably bear; that there was no need for outside governmental financial help for economic and social development anywhere in the world; that each nation, new or old, had enough of the knowledge and skills it needed for progress; that emergencies such as famines, floods, fires, or political upheavals could be handled without U.S. Government assistance.

Unfortunately, this millennium is not within sight, much less within reach. In its absence, or any reasonable facsimile thereof, we will need, in our own national interest, a mutual security program to deal constructively and imaginatively with the hard facts of international life. Which are the most important of these facts? I shall deal with three.

1. The fact of tremendous military power in unfriendly hands.

2. The fact of surge for economic and social progress in the underdeveloped nations.

3. The fact of growing U.S. dependence on oversea trade.

1. Military power: Despite the talk of peace, negotiation, and coexistence, we still face a most formidable military problem. Milwaukee is only 15 minutes away from Moscow—by intercontinental ballistic missile, which the Russians say they possess. The conventional airpower of the Sino-Soviet bloc consists of about 25,000 planes in operational units and it is a well-known fact that Russian jets are good. In the Russian and Chinese armies are some 400 line divisions, totaling more than 6½ million soldiers. The naval strength includes some 3,000 combatant vessels, of which about 500 are submarines. There has been no reduction in the Sino-Soviet military power. These forces still exist and are being equipped with better weapons every day.

We are still faced with international communism devoted to an often-stated purpose of taking over the world. Mr. Khrushchev has never, for 1 minute, budged on this point. It is an article of faith with him that communism will follow capitalism as night follows day. The only apparent change is in tactics, and we do not yet know whether this relatively new phenomenon will be a permanent change, or only a temporary one.

In the past, the Sino-Soviet bloc has proved, over, and over, and over again, that it will not hesitate to use armed force or threats of armed force to achieve its goals. The record of military occupation to install puppet governments in Eastern Europe; the record of the Berlin blockade; the record of the takeover of China; the record of Communist-abetted insurrections in Greece, Malaya, Indochina, the Philippines; the record of aggression in Korea—and now in India; the dismal record is on the books—clear for all to see.

It took time to realize that the Sino-Soviet bloc would keep on using armed forces to gobble up its neighbors unless stopped by military power. It took more time, working with our defense partners, to put together the free world defense strength to stop that outward march. I do not know any way, at present, to keep the Sino-Soviet bloc from engaging in further military action except for us to make it too risky for it to do so. We have made that risk too great and we must maintain this position until such time as we get workable and enforcible agreements which can bring about real peace and disarmament.

It is not the U.S. defense forces alone; it is not the defense forces of our allies alone; it is not the air and naval bases made available to us—none of these individual defense items could have done the job. But a free world collective defense, with many partners working together, helping each other—with all partners undertaking burdensome expenditures, all partners putting great numbers of young men into armies, navies, and air forces; all partners devoting large amounts of materiel to defense—all this has done the job.

2. Economic and social progress: I turn now to the second hard fact we face—the surge for economic and social progress. The tens of millions, indeed the hundreds of millions of people, in the underdeveloped parts of the world in Africa, Asia, and Latin America are no longer content merely to exist. As communication improves and brings knowledge of the outside world to great masses of these people, their conviction grows that their lot can and indeed must be improved. This demand for progress is particularly insistent in the 21 new countries with a population of 720 million people who have obtained their political independence since the end of World War II. Other new countries, perhaps as many more, will appear on the scenes during the next decade.

In all the underdeveloped countries, whether new or old, annual incomes are likely to average less than $100 a year. Illiteracy, disease, and malnutrition have been the rule rather than the exception. The leaders of these countries, either on their own or because of the pressure from within, or both, are committed to advance the well-being of their people. Whether this economic development takes place under a political system which is compatible with ours, a system which is based on the freedom and dignity of the individual, is vitally important to the security of the United States.

Let me stress that even though we may have convinced the Sino-Soviet bloc that the risk of military aggression is too great, we should not be lulled into believing that other forms of competition with international communism no longer exist or are declining. Indeed, it seems clear that the situation is exactly the reverse. As the advance of the retaliatory power of the free world makes the prospect for the achievement of the goal of world domination through overt military aggression more and more costly, the U.S.S.R. and its satellites are turning more and more to other means for achieving their ultimate goal.

During the past 3 years or so, the Communist bloc—largely the U.S.S.R.—has entered into agreements for the provision of $2.4 billion worth of economic assistance to 21 countries, primarily underdeveloped countries on the periphery of the bloc itself. The bloc is probing—and probing deeply—on the economic front all over the free world and appears to be eyeing with increasing interest the great continent of Africa and its many newly emerging countries. As the productive capacity of the Sino-Soviet bloc grows, particularly in the U.S.S.R., we can confidently expect a continuous increase in Communist efforts at economic penetration and political subversion.

3. U.S. economic need: The third important fact of life in the international world today is the increasing dependence of the United States on the rest of the world for raw materials and other imports to meet its ever-growing internal requirements, on the one hand, and as markets for its products, on the other. During the past two decades our imports have increased fivefold and our exports sevenfold. The latter amounted to nearly $21 billion last year and exceeded our imports by nearly $3½ billion. Nevertheless, this surplus in our trading account has not been sufficient to offset the red ink in our invisibles, principally the U.S. military expenditures abroad; the U.S. Government grants, loans, and other capital outflow; and private capital outflow for investment.

It is clear that the United States cannot run a balance-of-payments deficit of the current size indefinitely. Recently the Secretary of State commented on this matter as follows:

"The problem is to see to it that the deficit is reduced by means which enlarge international trade and do not restrict it—by methods which promote competition and the flow of development capital rather than restrict them. If this approach is to succeed, action is required of other countries, particularly Western Europe and Japan, to open their doors to American exports and to provide additional capital to the development of hungry nations of Asia, Africa, and the Near East and Latin America. At the recent meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the United States called for an end to the discriminatory restrictions which many foreign countries had been compelled to maintain against American exports in earlier years, but which are no longer needed. Our request received gratifying support on all sides. Both the Fund and GATT institutions recorded the view that discriminatory restrictions can no longer be generally justified on balance-of-payments grounds and many countries have taken action to eliminate discriminations."

The United States has been built upon the energy and initiative of individuals and upon the belief that, under the broad rules of fair play, free competition and initiative are the sinews of our economic and political strength. This holds true of our international activities as well as our domestic affairs.

But let us make no mistake about it. If through indifference and lack of understanding on our part we ignore the legitimate requirements of the free world for the resources to help it make economic progress and it turns elsewhere for this help and if, as a consequence, it adopts the political and economic practices of communism, our present balance-of-payments difficulties will fade into insignificance.

Free, friendly, and forward-moving countries are not only our best markets, our best sources of supply for the mutual benefit of all of us, but are essential to the maintenance of our way of life. As our experience with the Sino-Soviet bloc demonstrates, freedom of trade and commerce and private competition are incompatible with Communist ideology.

As long as these three major facts of international life face us, the United States will have to have, in its own interests, a mutual security program of some kind and of substantial magnitude. No doubt there will be changes in direction and emphasis, and in character and composition, as the facts of international conditions require, and the U.S. interests demand.

The biggest single cost element in our mutual security program today is that involved in the maintenance of the extensive military strength of the free world—the strength needed to deal with the first fact of international life—the threat of overt Communist aggression. We undertake to provide military assistance to deter this threat for exactly the same reason that we have our own domestic defense program—to help build up and maintain essential defensive strength. And let me emphasize we are only helping to maintain the military strength of our allies. Our allies contribute over $6 to our mutual defense for every dollar of military assistance the United States provides to them. I am no military man, but let me quote the President of the United States, who certainly has a reputation in the military field. Here is what he said to the Congress in submitting last year's mutual security program:

"These two requests, one for own defense forces, the other for our share in supporting the collective system, are but two elements in a single defense effort. Each is essential in the plans of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for our national security. Each is recommended to you by the same Joint Chiefs, the same Secretary of Defense, and the same Commander in Chief.

"Dollar for dollar our [military] expenditures for the mutual security program, after we have once achieved a reasonable military posture for ourselves, will buy more security than far greater additional expenditures for our own forces."

Some of our allies, particularly our NATO partners, have made rapid economic progress in the last decade. Not only are they in a position to reduce the dollar discrimination to which I referred earlier, but they are in a position to, and are indeed, carrying more of the burden of our mutual defense.

But our military allies are not limited to the advanced countries of Western Europe, nor is the military threat limited to this area. Our allies in the Far East and Asia—Korea, Nationalist China, Pakistan, and Turkey, for example—are not capable of maintaining the military establishments that are needed in our mutual interest, and military assistance from the United States must be provided.

Korea and Nationalist China have the fourth and fifth largest armies in the world, exceeded only by the armies of Red China, the U.S.R.R., and the United States. As long as the military threat continues, I can see no possibility of the United States discontinuing some military assistance to these countries. We can hope that it will become less as time passes. But we must be realistic, and the cost of modern armies is going up and not down.

In addition to direct military assistance, we are providing a dozen of our allies with economic assistance to help them to maintain these same military establishments and hopefully some modest economic growth. U.S. military assistance is limited to materiel and training. There are other costs to supporting military establishments—troop pay, subsistence, etc. These costs for such countries as Korea, Nationalist China, Pakistan, Turkey, Greece, and Vietnam are larger than can be met from their own resources. So in 12 countries, in addition to the provision of direct military equipment, the United States is also providing modest economic resources to help the country carry the burden of the military establishments which are needed for our protection as well as theirs.

We have a vital interest in the economic progress of these countries, in addition to our military interest in their defense establishment. If with our help these countries can gradually increase their rate of economic growth, thus eventually taking on more of the cost of carrying their own military establishment, then we can indeed look forward to the time when this component of the mutual security program can be reduced and, hopefully, eliminated.

These two components of the mutual security program—military assistance for our allies, and defense support economic aid for 12 of them—make up almost two-thirds of the mutual security program appropriations for this year—over $2 billion out of a total $3.2 billion.

I now turn again to the second international fact of life—the demand for progress in that vast area of the world characterized as "underdeveloped," and the vital importance to the United States that this progress be made under political and economic conditions which are compatible wtih those of the United States. Perhaps we can hope that Soviet leadership, as Secretary Herter recently said, "is reaching a conclusion similar to our own—that unless the course of events is changed and changed soon, both sides face unacceptable risks of general nuclear war, which would approximate mutual suicide." But even if, in fact, this turns out to be the case there still will be no basis for relaxing our efforts in the nonmilitary field. Indeed, in view of the growing economic strength of the Soviet Union, we will need to redouble—not relax our efforts. Mr. Khrushchev still makes no bones about his ultimate aims. They are the same as ever, even though the means perhaps will be different.

So within the framework of mutual security we must be concerned with development as we are concerned with defense. Most of the balance of the mutual security appropriation, the remaining one-third, is used to help the underdeveloped areas of the world to develop both their human resources and their physical resources. It is my personal conviction that lack of trained human resources is more likely to inhibit economic, political, and social progress than the lack of physical resources.

An utterly essential prerequisite to development in this day and age is literacy. Yet in underdeveloped areas of the world as a whole the literacy rate is less than 25 percent. In addition to basic literacy, economic progress is dependent upon an adequate supply of trained manpower all the way from skilled workmen through private and public managers to nuclear scientists. By and large these trained human resources are either woefully inadequate or missing entirely.

One component of the mutual security program is devoted to helping train these human resources. This is our technical cooperation, frequently called point 4 program. Today we have some 3,500 American technicians and consultants abroad helping and advising in agriculture, industry, public administration, health, education, and transportation, while annually we are providing training in the United States or other more developed countries, for some 8,000 nationals of the less developed parts of the world, in the same broad fields of human knowledge and endeavor.

We are not alone in this activity. The United Nations technical assistance program is operating in this field as are many other more developed countries in bilateral programs of their own, along with many American foundations and religious groups.

In the field of higher education, we in ICA have been calling more and more upon American universities to provide help and guidance in the establishment of similar institutions overseas. As of today we have 90 contracts with 53 American universities for help in 33 countries.

But the need is enormous, and education, whether narrowly or broadly defined, takes time—it takes a great deal of time. I am convinced that, no matter what progress may be made in our efforts to find a solid basis for coexisting with international communism, we will find it in our very direct interest to continue for the foreseeable future the technical assistance—point 4—component of our mutual security program.

The second component on the development side of our mutual security ledger is help in providing the physical resources needed for economic development. Currently these resources are provided largely through the Development Loan Fund, first authorized by the Congress about 3 years ago. This Fund is authorized to make resources available on a long-term-repayment basis, in local currency if the situation requires, for sound development projects for which no other reasonable source of financing is available.

The Development Loan Fund is not the only, indeed not even the major, source of capital resources for economic development. Others include the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Export-Import Bank of the United States, resources from other more developed countries, particularly those in Western Europe and over the horizon, an Inter-American Bank to help meet the needs of our Latin American friends and the International Development Association. Nevertheless, even with all these potential resources in sight, the economic progress of vast areas of the world is inadequate to meet the challenge of the times or explicitly the security interests of the United States.

There is a considerable body of opinion in the United States that the U.S. contribution to this development must be sharply increased. One recent study prepared by the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, at the request of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate, proposes that the U.S. Government for a 10-year period, starting in the fiscal year 1961, devote one-fourth of its additional production each year over and above present levels of assistance, to the economic development of less developed areas. In monetary terms this would contemplate something in the order of an additional $4 billion worth of assistance immediately and, as our own production grows during the decade, $6 or $8 billion a year a decade from now.

However, I am convinced, for the reasons elaborated earlier, that through one means or another we will need to continue for some time to contribute substantial resources to economic development in the less developed areas of the world. Much of this assistance cannot be on standard and traditional terms of repayment. Some of it should be provided initially as an outright grant and some more should involve flexible repayment provisions which permit the discharge of the obligation in local currency rather than convertible foreign exchange.

Let me remind this audience that in the early years of the United States, indeed through much if not all of the 19th century, this country relied heavily for its economic development on capital resources from abroad. Even today a major midwestern railroad—the Northwestern—runs on the left rather than the right—a heritage of its British origin. But, some will say, these investments were made on a business basis by private investors. True, but many of the enterprises defaulted on the bonds and thus in effect the project became a gift to the country.

One alternative proposal not infrequently advanced is that the U.S. Government, and thus the American taxpayer, should get out of the business of helping economic development overseas and permit, indeed encourage, American private investment to do the job. Nothing would please me better, but the possibilities must be looked at in perspective. The great underdeveloped areas of the world are the arc of Asia and Africa. I am sure it will surprise you to know, as it certainly surprised me, that U.S. private investment, exclusive of investments in oil, in all of Africa, in all the Near East and in all of South Asia and the Far East has amounted to less than $60 million a year during the past 5 years. The total for this vast area is less than the annual budget of Montgomery County, Md., where I live.

In saying this I have no intention of being critical of the American private investor. He wants reasonable security for and reasonable returns on his investment. Everyone in this audience could think of many countries in which he would be not only hesitant but completely unwilling to make any investments. But yet these countries are very likely indeed to be countries in which, from the point of view of the interest of all Americans, economic development is the most vital.

The U.S. Government is working hard at its job to make the climate overseas attractive to American private investors, through treaties of friendship, commerce and navigation, tax treaties and the like. We in ICA for 10 years have been offering for a modest fee to guarantee the American private investor against losses from either expropriation or inconvertibility. More recently the Congress has extended this coverage to include damage resulting from war. The past year or so our coverage expanded sharply and now amounts to $432 million. Much of this guarantee coverage was, however, in the more advanced countries. During the past session the Congress limited this guarantee authority, effective January 1, 1960, to underdeveloped countries.

We are most anxious to have private investment take on more of the responsibility. In addition to our investment guarantee program, we have established a senior officer with staff to devote his attention exclusively to the job of encouraging and facilitating American and other foreign private investment in underdeveloped areas of the world.

We believe also that the countries of Western Europe, and now perhaps Japan, can, both bilaterally and multilaterally, contribute more to this economic development. It seems to us clear too that the contribution of other developed countries must also include a larger component of noncommercial grants and loans and it is for this reason the United States recently proposed the formation of the International Development Association which under the expert management of the most successful International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, can help provide more of the noncommercial requirements for development.

Now before closing I should like to turn briefly to one other aspect of the mutual security program, namely its administration. The mutual security program seems to generate, for reasons not wholly clear to me, more than the usual number of charges of poor administration. Of course we make mistakes. The only person who never makes a mistake is one who never makes a decision.

The International Cooperation Administration in helping to carry out more than 1,000 projects every year, scattered in 60 countries, where working conditions, local standards of conduct of managerial capacity and of business experience are completely different from those existing in the United States. Despite these additional handicaps, I am wholly satisfied that our batting average is very high. We have a loyal, competent, devoted staff who take pride in getting things done well under conditions which would, I can assure you, baffle and frustrate many of us. But to repeat, we do make mistakes and I can have no legitimate complaint when these mistakes are reported fully to the American public. Obviously the taxpayer is entitled to this knowledge. I could wish that the successes were as widely publicized as are our mistakes, but perhaps this is too much to hope.

About 2 years ago we devoted the time and effort necessary to investigate and report on a list compiled by the House Foreign Affairs Committee of charges which at that time were being commonly made against the mutual security program, including allegations that we were giving iceboxes to Eskimos and dress suits to Greek undertakers. The committee listed some 96 of these charges. Some of these like the two I mentioned were pure fiction. Eight did not apply to the mutual security program at all; some 20 were errors in fact; over one-half were misinterpretations or differences in judgment. Not one represented an error or mistake not corrected. I have here in my hand part 6 of the hearings before that committee. The list of questions and the responses thereto occupy 55 printed pages. How many of you are aware, I wonder, that such a list had been compiled, analyzed, and made publicly available?

There is in Wisconsin, I believe, an organization which around the turn of the year annually makes awards for the tallest "tall story" of that year. I am seriously considering entering in this contest some of the fabrications dealing with the mutual security program. I feel confident that one or more of them would win the award hands down. The regular entries in the competition are submitted in the spirit of good clean fun and are accepted and understood for what they are. No harm is done. Unfortunately, incorrect reporting, or even worse, pure fabrications, on the mutual security program could be seriously detrimental to the security of the United States.

Now to return to the main theme. In summary the major components of the current mutual security program or some alternative thereto will in my opinion have to continue in some magnitude for the foreseeable future. This program does cost money—does require U.S. resources that might otherwise be used for different purposes but in our concentration on costs we have many times I fear lost sight of value. The real question about the mutual security program is not "What does it cost?" but "What is it worth?" Value and price are not the same; nor is a thing automatically good because it is cheap and bad because it is expensive.

What is it worth to the United States that the balance of power for peace remains with the free world and has not been moved to the Communists' side of the scales? What is it worth to the United States to have strong and willing partners for defense? What is it worth to the United States to have the use of air, naval, and communication bases at strategic spots around the world? What is it worth to the United States to have strong trading partners able to stand on their own feet and pay their own way? What is it worth to the United States to have prevented economic and perhaps political collapse in Western Europe and in countries like Iran, Turkey, Korea, Vietnam, Taiwan, the Philippines, and Pakistan? What is it worth to the United States that most of the developing nations turn first toward the West when they look for outside help in developing their resources and their institutions? What is it worth to this country that there are being created, by and large, whole societies whose institutions, of government and business, are compatible with our own? What is it worth to the United States that we do not have to go it alone and do not have to incur increased taxes and draft calls to supply U.S. Armed Forces equal to free world totals?

These are the kinds of questions we should be asking ourselves and we should try to find out what part the mutual security program has in the answers. We should go further. In this era of change we should ask if there are available better or less costly alternatives for achieving the goals we have set ourselves. Even should the need for defense disappear completely there will still be need for development programs for years to come. We would have an interest in these programs even should there be no competition from international communism. In the years ahead I am convinced that the economic and technical parts of the mutual security program will become even more important than they have been up until now.

Tomorrow you will hear from several distinguished gentlemen on various aspects of the subject before the conference. From the information you receive, from the points of view presented, you can then draw your own conclusion about our stake in foreign aid.

UNIVERSITY OF THE AIR

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, in our current discussions of television, it is imperative that we consider some of the substantial and unique contributions that medium has made to our society.

Through the wonders of electronics an experiment was undertaken 9 years ago this month which has helped enrich the lives of people in four States. "The University of the Air" was founded, in cooperation with 22 leading colleges and universities, to offer college-level training for anyone motivated enough to flick a dial.

It began on station WFIL–TV, the Triangle television station in Philadelphia, and is now carried also by the following Triangle stations: WNBF–TV, Binghampton, N.Y.; WFBG–TV, Altoona-Johnstown, Pa.; WNHC–TV, Hartford-New Haven, Conn.; WLYH–TV, Lebanon-Lancaster, Pa.; and KFRE–TV, Fresno, Calif.

Participating colleges and universities include: Albright College, Reading, Pa.; La Salle College, Philadelphia, Pa.; Beaver College, Jenkintown, Pa.; Bryn Mawr College, Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Lehigh University, Bethlehem, Pa.; Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, Pa.; Division of School Extension, School District of Philadelphia, Philadelphia, Pa.; Eastern Baptist College, St. Davids, Pa.; Haverford College, Haverford, Pa.; Pennsylvania Military College, Chester, Pa.; Pennsylvania State University, Ogontz Center, Abington, Pa.; Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.; Rutgers University, New Brunswick, N.J.; Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa.; the Pennsylvania State College of Optometry, Philadelphia, Pa.; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa.; Drexel Institute of Technology, Philadelphia, Pa.; Glassboro State College, Glassboro, N.J.; Lincoln University, Lincoln University, Pa.; New Jersey Education Association, Trenton, N.J.; Philadelphia College of Pharmacy and Science, Philadelphia, Pa.; Rider College, Trenton, N.J.; St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, Pa.; Temple University, Philadelphia, Pa.; the Philadelphia Textile Institute Foundation, Philadelphia, Pa.; Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa.

In the semester now ending the "University of the Air" has offered its 188th course. Its audience has been estimated at more than 250,000 "students" who see one or more shows each week.

Today the "University of the Air" is the oldest and largest continuously run adult education program in commercial television. It has been called television's most ambitious program of mass education.

This ninth birthday of the "University of the Air" is a good occasion to remind ourselves that commercial television, when in the hands of intelligent, civic-minded people, can make an important contribution to the culture of our society.

ARTICLE FROM FOREIGN AFFAIRS QUARTERLY BY HON. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, one of the truly great leaders of this era, both in our Nation and in the world, is former Gov. Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois. Governor Stevenson has a profound knowledge and wisdom regarding foreign affairs and international questions. In the January 1960 issue of Foreign Affairs, Adlai Stevenson has contributed an article, "Putting First Things First." In this thoughtful and informative article, Governor Stevenson has called attention to our great responsibilities in maintaining freedom in the world and in expanding economic opportunity for underdeveloped nations. He has rallied us to the urgency of the sacrifice which is necessary if we are to survive. Anybody reading this article will realize anew that Adlai Stevenson has the stature, integrity, and intellect to head our Nation at a time of world crisis. Because Governor Stevenson's message is so important to all Americans generally and to those who sit in the Senate and the House in particular, I ask unanimous consent that his splendid article from Foreign Affairs for January be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Foreign Affairs, January 1960]

PUTTING FIRST THINGS FIRST—A DEMOCRATIC VIEW

(By Adlai E. Stevenson)

Peace is the most imperative business in the world today. It is the world's most universal desire and most powerful force. The mass of humanity seems to understand better than its rulers the idiocy of war and its mortal danger to the human race. Everywhere I travel the people appear to know that all their aspirations for freedom and dignity and a better life are going to be destroyed if mankind ever fights a modern war.

The United States has been the source of the most revolutionary and glorious concepts of human and political freedom. It had been my hope that in this revolutionary century the United States, which first split the atom, would be the tireless, fearless, indomitable leader of the cause of freedom from war. And I still think that to seize that role and pursue it with passion should be the top priority of American foreign policy.

Why haven't we really led the postwar world since the Korean war? Why are many Americans fearful that we have lost our sense of national purpose? Why is there confusion about intellectual and moral values? Why is there a slackness about public problems and a wholesale retreat to the joys of private life? Why is balancing the budget a greater national concern than exertion, self-denial, and hard work? Have we confused prosperity with security? Why is there a growing uneasiness over the contrast between a society like that of the Soviets which believes in its destiny and our own which seems to regard itself as fulfilled?

Personally, I think the trouble is not in the Nation's energy, its will, or its nerve; and if wealth and comfort have softened us I am sure we are not yet beyond repair. The root of the trouble lies in this: the Nation faces a series of massive changes in the world scene; they call for new ways of looking at the world; for new policies; for increased efforts. But since Korea our political leadership has not clearly and insistently acknowledged this fact. American policy has thus moved further and further away from the reality that surrounds us. Unchallenged by the realities, Americans have turned their energies and idealism to second-order business.

The main lines of American military and foreign policy are still those of 1947–52. Although Messrs. Dulles and Eisenhower crusaded for a policy of liberation and denounced containment as immoral in operation their policy was to construct a chain of military alliances around communism and to attempt to restrain the spread of Soviet power wherever it threatened. Oddly enough, Mr. Dulles' faith that communism would disintegrate from its own internal contradictions resembled Lenin's conviction that capitalism would do the same.

But to win such an endurance contest we must have superior endurance. Yet instead of making massive efforts to improve or preserve the balance and to encourage attrition or benign change on the Soviet side, we emphasized conservative policies and fell behind on all fronts, while the Soviet Union, and other industrial areas, forged ahead at a rapid pace.

In short, while our Government adopted the Dulles foreign policy it did nothing to make it effective. Indeed, it was not long ago that Vice President NIXON saw something disloyal in my warnings about the Soviet rate of economic growth. (It is now double that of the United States.)

So for the most part the response of the United States to the great changes of this century has been only negative and defensive. An administration which has defined its overriding task as keeping the budget down has dealt with them more with rhetoric than action. And unwillingness to acknowledge reality has led to a progressive erosion of the American stature on the world scene. (Sometimes I thank God for Russians—their rapid progress may even make economic growth, risk, and adventure essential, if not respectable, here.)

But it is not my purpose to indict the small aims and large fears of the Eisenhower-Dulles era. Things had to change, and I applaud Secretary Herter for the recent signs of more enterprise and flexibility in the conduct of our foreign policy. I hope, however, that we Americans do not mistake the President's ceremonial travels for negotiation and settlement.

What are some of the realities we must face in this age of many revolutions? The old colonial order has all but vanished. New nations—and new imperialisms—strive to fill the vacuum in a vast political revolution. Most of these new nations seek to bring their economies through the sound barrier of modernization in a few decades. This is the economic revolution. But they do so against the background of exploding population which will double the inhabitants of underdeveloped areas in the next generation. This is the biological revolution. Meanwhile, supersonic flight, atomic energy, and the missile have opened up two opposite possibilities of equal magnitude—the exploration of planetary space and self-extermination within the space of this planet. This is the scientific revolution.

What lies ahead of us in this bewildering century is invisible but it may be even more significant. In the past the North Atlantic nations dominated the world. But they could not control themselves, and after their great world wars the power and influence of Europe declined; Russia and the United States suddenly emerged as the two dominant powers. Already the brief day of two-power domination is passing and new centers of power are rising from old ashes in Asia. By the end of the century China and India will be industrialized, and China's population will be close to a billion. Then, as Europe becomes more unified, it too will reemerge as a great center of power. And who can doubt that regional unification is going to take place in Latin America and emerging Africa?

So, this is not the beginning of the American century, or anyone else's. It behooves us to face the reality that we Americans are not going to be alone at the center of the stage very long—and that modesty is always becoming. But if our tradition does not require us to be the world's boss, it does require us to keep alive and vigorous the great traditions of political freedom and legal order which underlie Western society.

To guide us through these uncharted seas, to comprehend and direct the prodigious forces now shaping the new world, is going to make heavy demands on our resources of wisdom, leadership, self-discipline, and magnanimity. I would say that this reality belongs at the top of the list, because it has not yet been proved that democracy and the processes of persuasion can match the efficiency of central planning and dictatorship.

Multiple and universal change is thus the setting for policy in this age. Another reality we have been slow to admit is the present advantage this gives to the Communists. They did not invent the world's revolutions. All of these were, wittingly or unwittingly, launched in the West. But communism, in itself a philosophy of change, exploits them worldwide. It uses all the anti-imperialist jargon and proclaims the brotherhood of—Communist—mankind. To our everlasting shame it has led the way through the frontiers of space and even pinned the Soviet colors on the moon. It proposes its own sweeping totalitarian planning as the only way out of economic stagnation, and the Soviet example of how to modernize and grow strong quickly has a powerful appeal to backward countries.

Mr. Khrushchev states his purpose plainly. He says, let's throw down our arms and we will beat you at peaceful competitive coexistence. He says that Russia will outstrip the United States in production and that one by one the neutrals will fall in line, while the Communist system spreads around the globe, and finally surrounds and isolates capitalism's last refuge in the United States. The Soviet planners expect that, as in China, the non-Communist regimes in Asia, the Middle East, Africa, and parts of Latin America will be unable to solve the problems of modernization and economic growth and will turn to the Communist alternative, encouraged no doubt by Communist trade, aid, and penetration.

This, I am convinced, is the route to world power which the Soviets now regard as the safest and surest. And I was impressed by Khrushchev's confidence, shown both in his country and ours, that history is working with him and that the system under which Russia became so strong so quickly is the system which other countries must follow. We refused to believe that Hitler meant what he said, to our sorrow. We should not do ourselves the same injury again.

To me the two most dangerous realities we now face are the multiplication of nuclear weapons and the disparity in living standards between the rich nations and the poor. So I suggest we must meet the crises of our time in four major areas: First, we must end the growing gap between wealth and poverty. In doing so, we must create new supranational patterns and institutions of cooperation. Thirdly, as long as nuclear weapons exist, the danger of their use exists. We must work for a disarmed world under law and organized police power—the only final answer to the threat of annihilating war. And, lastly, we must extend as far as lies in our power the concept of an open world. For it is in our acceptance of variety and differences, harmonized but not suppressed, that we in our turn work not only with the trend of history but in accord with the ingrained diversity of mankind. Our faith is that in the long contest the totalitarians will gradually be converted to our way of thinking rather than we to theirs. Our goal is not just to win a cold war but to persuade a cold world.

These are, of course, statements of high generality. We turn them into policy only by specific application and negotiation. Some aims we can pursue with like-minded nations, and we should proceed with them at once. Others depend on Communist assent and may take years of stoic negotiation.

The beginning of wisdom in the West, I think, is to have our own creative policy—not just a negative policy to stop the Communists, but one that reflects our own vision of a viable world society and our own understanding of the revolutions through which we live. The voluntary ending of colonialism by most of the Western colonial powers, the Marshall plan, Europe's moves toward unity, and the various programs of economic aid, are creative innovations already to the West's postwar credit.

Once we know what we want, what our aims are, then we shall have to pursue them by every means with the same resolution and sacrifice that the Communists pursue theirs. It will not be easy to agree on them in view of the divisions among the Western Powers, combined with the fact that Russia controls Eastern Germany and, therefore, the possibility of German unification. I suspect the hardest task will be to pursue our aims resolutely in common with our partners. For in peacetime democracies are at a particular disadvantage. Immediate domestic concerns take precedence over distant national goals. Too many selfish, thoughtless people prefer the easy option and too many ambitious politicians prefer office to duty. But we cannot live by tail fins, TV, and a sound dollar alone. Somehow we must lift our sights to the level of the tasks. I will try to suggest some of them.

II. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The average annual income in the United States is more than $2,000 as against less than $100 for a third of the world's population. And the worst thing about this disparity is that the rich nations are getting richer and the poor poorer. Happily, there is, at long last, a growing realization here and among our friends that these are the decisive areas and that we must assist the underdeveloped peoples to advance to self-sustaining growth while preserving their independence and some hope of evolving a political democracy. Without an alternative to Communist methods of development, we face grim prospects indeed in poor countries where literacy is low, hunger high, and the gap between resources and population widening.

Five conditions of success are, I think, clear. We shall be engaged on this program for at least 40 years. We shall require a professional staff, with the languages and skills needed in this whole new field of activity. Informed opinion tells us that at least $5 billion a year is needed—from all sources, public and private, domestic and foreign. We shall have to coordinate all aspects of the effort with other nations—not only investment but opportunities for trade, international liquidity, and so forth. To get the maximum results the developed nations must all cooperate. The time has certainly come for other countries to share more of the common burden of assistance. In such circumstances the United States cannot expect to have full control of the use of all its expenditures for development purposes.

These five conditions are not yet fully understood, let alone accepted. There is still more than a hint that if the Communists would behave, the economic development program could be canceled. Partly as a result, our staffing policies are haphazard, our linguistic programs inadequate, and we are acquiring so many competing agencies, both national and international, that policies tend to be tangled and obstructed at the base and overlapping and bewildering in the field.

I regret that the administration rejected the recommendation of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last winter for a soft loan fund of about a billion and a half dollars for about 5 years. With Europe prosperous and dollars flowing to that area, Europe should mobilize an equivalent sum. With something like $3 billion a year available for public investment, with the West's great resources of skill and experience, and working with the World Bank, the Monetary Fund, and the new International Development Association, we should be able to plan an effective, concerted attack upon all aspects of backwardness—lack of capital, lack of skills, low reserves, single-crop exports and fluctuating world prices.

It is difficult to establish priorities, but I believe there is general agreement that the whole political future of free Asia may depend on the success of India's great experiment. Certainly, too, the need is obvious for more rapid modernization and economic cooperation in Latin America. And the vision of a common market for the Western Hemisphere is even more exciting if it points toward economic federation in the whole non-Communist world.

For years I have urged that the United States put economic development on the same level of urgency as national defense, and press other advanced countries to join in a concerted effort. That in actuality we have no such joint program for world investment and growth springs in part from another weakness—our failure to develop an organic Atlantic community with common institutions and purposes. The ghost that has haunted every NATO conference for 10 years is the ghost of the emperor without clothes. "The wise men," committees, resolutions—all have spoken of NATO's positive tasks. We still have to find them. Worse, even the present measure of unity is being fretted away.

III. THE ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

Beneath the surface there are dangerous cross-purposes within our alliance. They are not to be overcome by ceremonial travels and by hasty diplomacy in preparation for meetings with Mr. Khrushchev.

The reconciliation of France and Germany is an historic achievement of postwar diplomacy. The Common Market is a creative effort to pass beyond narrow nationalism in the search for economic and social well-being and finally political union. But the price is high if France by moving closer to Germany moves away from Britain, and if the Common Market of the six nations and the free trade associations of the seven between them divide Europe into rival trading groups behind rising economic barriers which embitter not only commerce but politics as well. Nor do the divisions affect Europe alone. The frictions will be spread to Africa as a last divisive legacy of colonialism.

I believe it is a profound interest of American policy to see these nascent divisions overcome. We should urge the six and the seven to return to negotiation to mitigate tariff discrimination and liberalize trade. The United States and Canada should also cooperate systematically with the six and the seven to enlarge and use our influence vigorously to help solve in common the tough problems of commercial policy, including such questions as the stabilization of commodity prices in which the industrialized countries must of necessity take the lead. The last 3 or 4 years have demonstrated how even our own trade is becoming dependent upon European prosperity and how policies on each side of the Atlantic vitally influence the rest of the community. The unfavorable American balance of payments and fears for American reserves are already leading to a new isolationism, to creeping protectionism, to reduced foreign aid, and to further divisions in our unity and strength. The administration's "Buy American" policy in our lending will have negligible effects on our exports, and it repudiates the liberal trade and payments policy which we have been urging on our allies at the very moment they are adopting it.

Nor can we safely confront the Communist challenge with inferior military deterrent capability. If we fall too far behind or reduce our military strength—without equivalent Soviet concessions—we may find Mr. Khrushchev's interest in negotiation has diminished. We must not tempt the Russians with weakness. The possibility that they could destroy our retaliatory power at a single blow must never appear to them to be realistic. Even then, the only safe assumption for us to make is that the Soviet Union may use force, as in Hungary or East Germany, wherever there is no risk of general war. As I said to Mr. Khrushchev, equality of strength and equality of risk are the only starting points for disarmament discussions.

In maintaining the military balance pending a reversal of this senseless and bankrupting arms race, Western Europe also should play an expanded role and assume a larger burden. The cooperative control and use of atomic weapons may now be the best way to prevent the divisive, costly, and inefficient duplication of nuclear capabilities. Each one of the European nations cannot develop defenses capable of countering the Soviet threat, and should not try. I think we must take a hard, fresh look at our common military problems. I don't see why we cannot distribute the nuclear, the naval, and the conventional burdens more economically and efficiently. The objective should be an interdependent military system in which each nation's role would be geared to its full technological and economic capabilities.

Let us, then, recognize the fact of our economic, military, and political interdependence formally. An Atlantic Council with real powers could formulate joint policies for sharing our responsibilities and bringing about the genuine and equal partnership between the United States and Western Europe which our successes in the past—notably the Marshall plan—make feasible and the greatest challenge we have ever known now makes necessary.

I believe a North Atlantic Conference should be held to outline new common policies for defense, disarmament, space exploration, monetary reserves, tariffs, and a larger economic sphere, and aid to the underdeveloped areas, giving, I hope, new terms of reference to NATO and to other organizations. I think Europe should take the initiative toward creating some such new organization to deal with our great and growing problems and to promote more systematic Western cooperation.

Meanwhile, if our partners, including Japan, are to mitigate the harmful political pressures building up in the United States, a number of steps—toward which, I am glad to say, some progress has already been made—should be taken promptly.

Discrimination against dollar imports from the United States and all quantitative restrictions should be eliminated.

I have long urged that the nations whose economies the United States has helped to restore should assume a much larger share of the burden of aiding the underdeveloped countries.

The heavy task of maintaining large forces overseas aggravates America's balance of payments deficit; our European allies should now assume greater responsibility for the defense of the West.

While our balance of payments deficit may be a short-range problem, the liquidity shortage of the trading nations is not, and the West should move to correct this deficiency promptly.

A working cooperative Atlantic system would do more than enhance the basic strength of the West. It would demonstrate to other areas—to Latin America, for instance, or to free Africa—methods by which political autonomy can be combined with supranational cooperation. In any case, the alternative is to see the centrifugal forces which are always at work between separate national entities pull us ever further apart. One thing is sure—we cannot deal with the Communist challenge divided and in disarray.

IV. ARMS CONTROL

Most of all, a stronger Atlantic community will show the way to disarmament and peace. The implications of war and of the nuclear stalemate are as visible in Moscow as in Washington. After talks with Mr. Khrushchev in Russia and America, I have the feeling that some fixed Communist attitudes are changing; some, at least, of the Russian leaders seem to have concluded that the capitalist countries do not conform in all respects to the Marxist blueprints of misery and despair; Mr. Khrushchev has even changed his mind about the established Communist conviction that the United States could not cut arms spending without bringing on a depression. (I confess I get indignant when I listen to some of my fellow Americans who seem less confident than Khrushchev is about our economy's resilience, especially when we have so many neglected tasks at home to which we could turn our energies and resources.)

The more the Communists see of the realities of Western society, the better for truth and so the better for us. Knowing something of the frightening darkness in which most Russians have to live, I favor the widest extension of exchange programs and cultural contacts. I would like to see the United States take the initiative in bringing Western and Soviet teams together in joint work. The principle of the Geophysical Year should be extended to a joint international Geophysical Commission. Other fields are Antarctic exploration and control, oceanography, medical and atomic energy research, exploration of outer space, and even joint operations in certain areas of economic aid. Such communion of scholars and technicians could do more than awaken Communists to the reality of Western life and to the possibilities of an open world society. They could be forerunners of supranational cooperation and organs of international control.

There is no difficulty in finding reasons why peace is so precious to the Russians after the desolation and destruction of two world wars. In addition, they now have much to lose, and their taste for the good life is rapidly developing. It is said that the Soviet defense effort takes about 25 percent of the national income as against 10 percent in this country. So for them another weighty reason for reducing the arms burden is to release more manpower and resources to improve the living conditions of the long-suffering Russian people and to strengthen the Soviet potential for economic competition and the paramount struggle for the uncommitted countries.

I am confident that some, at least, of the Russian leaders are anxious to halt testing and development of nuclear weapons before the danger becomes even more uncontrollable. But I wish I could be more sanguine that the Soviet Union was equally ready for the kind of inspection and control that would make possible any general arms reduction, let alone total disarmament. I suspect the conversion of the Soviet Union from a closed to an open society is still a long way off. But we should not hastily and cynically dismiss Mr. Khrushchev's disarmament proposals as propaganda and insincere. The question is not whether Communists are sincere but whether they are serious.

The root of East-West tension is fear. Whether it is rational or irrational, justified or not, hardly matters. It exists, and the peoples, especially Americans and Russians, have been indoctrinated with this fear of one another—these devil images—for years. Arms are a symptom of the fears and tensions between nations. Therefore, the argument goes, disarmament is impossible until political settlements have been reached and confidence restored.

I disagree. I believe the nuclear arms race with weapons of mass destruction is a new element and in itself a cause of tension. Of course, as I have said, we must try everlastingly to improve relations by exchanges, negotiations, common projects, trade, and agreements when possible. But fear will not vanish until the arms race is arrested. We will have to proceed on all these matters simultaneously. As Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, of Great Britain, said in presenting the British plan for comprehensive disarmament which preceded Mr. Khrushchev's: "If we get political settlements it will make agreement on disarmament easier; and if we get an agreement on disarmament, it will make political settlement easier."

From what he said to me, I think Mr. Khrushchev agrees too. And I am much encouraged by evidence from many quarters that the Russians are genuinely worried about the political and technical dangers and cost to the U.S.S.R. of continuing the arms race indefinitely. Moreover, the United Nations disarmament resolution, agreed to, mirabile dictu, by the United States and the Soviet Union, recognizes that disarmament itself will promote trust between nations and declares that disarmament is the most important question facing the world today.

In short, it looks as though controlled disarmament was back at the top of the world's agenda where it belongs. I am sorry that the United States did not take and hold the lead as I urged in the 1956 presidential campaign. The recent proposal by some of our leaders that the United States resume underground nuclear tests, just when the first break in the arms deadlock seems possible, shocked me. I can think of few better ways to chill the prospects, deface our peaceful image, and underscore the Communist propaganda that they are the peacemakers and we the warmongers. We should extend our test suspension so long as negotiations continue in good faith and Russia maintains a similar suspension. The good faith of the negotiations is decisive, because indefinite suspension amounts to a test ban without inspection.

Whether Mr. Khrushchev and his associates in the Kremlin really mean business depends on agreement to two main principles: (a) That conventional and nuclear disarmament must go hand in hand, so that the balance of security between nations is not upset, and (b) that progress at each stage must be subject to effective international control.

If universal and total disarmament should ever take place, a third need will arise: a supranational force of some kind, as I have insisted to Mr. Khrushchev, in order that the sheer weight of such powers as Russia and America—or China—may not intimidate smaller neighbors. The composition, control, and use of such a force, of course, present a host of further questions.

Meanwhile, pending the disarmament millennium, we must, as I have said, make good the deficiencies in our defenses to keep at least an equality of strength with the Russians. And I think it would be naive to assume that they are yet ready to embark on the kind of positive cooperation in other respects which would establish real collective security. The conspiratorial tradition is very old and deep rooted in Communist thinking, and when they talk of peaceful competition, for example, I suspect that most Communists would include under that label political subversion, coups d'état, and even revolution under Communist Party leadership.

Nevertheless, I think we may be approaching the time when the arms race with Russia can be arrested. Once a revolutionary regime leaves behind its adolescent fanaticism, risk, and cost become powerful considerations. I believe they exercise genuine influence in Moscow today and that we should do what we can to encourage the trend.

V. CHINA

In Peking, however, I doubt if cost and risk are decisive factors. At this stage, pressure from "foreign devils," real or contrived, provides excuses for the austerity and brutal repression involved in the massive modernization. In this mood, China might conceivably be ready to risk a war which could involve its more prosperous Communist neighbor in disaster. Today, Moscow can still perhaps limit Chinese aggressiveness by control over its military aid. But as China develops, the influence will dwindle. Has Russia therefore an interest in establishing some form of control now while her influence is still sizable? We do not know, but we must try to find out. And if we are going to make any important progress on disarmament, Russia will have to accept responsibility for bringing China in.

While there is little prospect of reasonable dealing with Red China at this time, it is apparent that Asians have become disillusioned and distrustful because of her imperialistic attacks on her neighbors and disregard for the "five principles of coexistence." I see hope in the fact that Mr. Khrushchev used Peking as his sounding board when he warned Communists not to use force against capitalism. I see further hope in his proposal—ignored by Peking—for an atom-free zone in the Far East. And even at this late date I suggest we explore with him the possibility of pacification in the area based upon a broad settlement of issues—including Formosa—by negotiation, not force.

On the Communist side, the concessions would include the extension to China of any system of international inspection of disarmament, ending the threat of force against Formosa and subversion in Indochina, a peaceful frontier settlement with India, free elections under United Nations supervision in Korea, and acceptance of the right of the inhabitants of Formosa to determine their own destiny by plebiscite supervised by the United Nations. On our side, concessions would presumably include an end to the American embargo on China's admission to the United Nations (not to be confused with diplomatic recognition), the evacuation of Quemoy and Matsu, and the inclusion of Korea and Japan in the atom-free zone and area of controlled disarmament.

Perhaps neither the Russians nor we ourselves are yet prepared to talk in such concrete terms. Yet it is clear that no general control of disarmament has any value unless it includes China, and it is difficult to see how China can accept international control when it is not, formally, a member of international society. Moreover, as a member of the United Nations, Communist China, with a quarter of the world's population, would be more accountable to world opinion than as an outcast.

In the long run, the degree to which Russia is willing and able to moderate China's imperialistic designs will be a major factor in world peace. And it is likely that in its diplomacy as in its internal development Moscow is reaching the point where Mr. Khrushchevs' peaceful coexistence with the West must grow into positive cooperation. The Russian door to the West must be pushed wider open—or slammed shut again.

VI. EUROPE AND THE MIDDLE EAST

The areas of the world where the interests and security of the great powers collide are the areas of tension where negotiation must be concentrated if it is to be effective. I do not believe that local military blocs, directed against the Communists, always provide the answer. If we seek military clients, Russia can play that game, too, and more cynically. Moreover, she is not embarrassed by ties to the former colonial overlords. I do not mean that endangered countries should be left unprotected. The Eisenhower doctrine is hardly more than a restatement of our commitment under the United Nations Charter and the Truman doctrine to come to the aid of a victim of direct aggression. If the Soviets were directly to invade Iran, though it is not likely, American intervention would be unavoidable. And that is precisely why it is not likely. But Iran is no more secure because of military links with Pakistan, and the fate of Iraq shows how easily an unpopular alliance can be exploited to undermine a pro-Western regime.

I believe that we must look rather to disarmament and nonalinement, to political and economic collaboration, in the areas where great-power interests collide, as in the Middle East. We still have a little time, for atomic weapons are as yet in the possession of only three powers. Ten years from now, who knows how many local dictators may have them—to the detriment not only of our security but of Russia's as well. Here may be another common interest to explore. We might examine the possibility of an atom-free zone for the Middle East. We might also reconsider an earlier suggestion of an embargo on arms shipments into the Middle East—a plan which the Soviets have endorsed.

Neither Russia nor the Western nations have gained much from their recent policies of intervention in the Middle East. I suggest we now give organized nonintervention a trial. Some international problems are never solved; they just wear out. And the Arab-Israeli conflict may wear out before it is worked out. But meanwhile the United States should call upon the Soviet Union and everyone in the United Nations again and again to use their influence to harmonize relations between the Arab States and Israel and end this prolonged and useless hostility.

In the immediate future, however, the critical point of tension lies in Europe and Germany. There we have a perilous deadlock from which neither side can disengage without grave risk. On our side the fear is paramount that any withdrawal either from the exposed enclave of West Berlin or from West Germany would prove the first step in a general retreat from "positions of strength" in Europe. The end of the process could denude the Continent of American forces and undermine the defenses against a Russian advance to the channel.

But the Soviets have comparable fears. The withdrawal of their troops to Russia would imperil the insecure Communist governments friendly to Russia and lead to the resurgence of a powerful and potentially hostile Germany. After suffering two shattering invasions in a generation, Russia's deep-seated fear of a rearmed Germany should not be hard for us to understand.

Russia's risk is probably greater than ours. After 15 years of communism, East Germany and Eastern Europe are still probably hostile to Russia. On our side, communism has steadily lost ground. A Europe free to choose its destiny would not be Communist, and could be very anti-Russian. For this reason I believe we in the West play from strength in Europe.

I agree with Dr. Adenauer that the key to settlement in divided Europe lies in controlled general disarmament. The only satisfactory settlement for divided Berlin will be the unification of divided Germany. The road to unification lies through a reduction of fear in Russia and the West. And fear will subside only when there is progress toward disarmament with adequate controls. I doubt if we can reach more than provisional settlements or postponements of the problems of divided Europe until then.

With summit conferences soon to take place, I think it would be improper and useless for me to discuss proposals that have been made for an atom-free zone in central Europe, scaling down of Berlin garrisons and occupation armies, security guarantees, and the other detailed components of possible interim solutions.

VII. A SENSE OF PURPOSE

In all of these great issues of international policy—whether they concern a world investment program for the underdeveloped countries, or methods of closer association with Europe, or the creation of communities of common work and interest with the Soviets, or the whole long arduous search for controlled disarmament—the first priority for the West is to recover the initiative. Out of a perpetually defensive attitude no lasting gains can come. Surely the West, which has been preeminently the challenger in human affairs since the dawn of the modern age, should not let the initiative slip from its hands.

Today, let us be clear, we do not have the initiative. Having caught up with us in weapons, it is the Soviet Union that is shouting about disarmament and peaceful competition; and it is the Soviet Union, strong and self-confident, that is now usurping the role of leader in the efforts toward peace. Mr. Khrushchev is the challenger—from outer space to inner Berlin. We react to his policies and conduct the world's dialog on his terms. Between hasty improvisations and snap decisions we seem largely to have lost our own sense of direction.

We are ourselves to blame for this. The truth is that nations cannot demonstrate a sense of purpose abroad when they have lost it at home. There is an intimate connection between the temper of our domestic leadership and the effectiveness of American influence in the world at large. President Wilson gave a profound new direction to international thinking because he was a pioneer of the new freedom at home. President Franklin Roosevelt's universal prestige as a liberal force in the world was deeply rooted in the New Deal, and this was the tradition carried on by President Truman in such great ventures as the Marshall plan and the point 4 program. The link is no less vital today. If we cannot recover an aspiring, forward-looking, creative attitude to the problems of our own community, there is little hope of our recovering a dynamic leadership in the world at large. By our default as much as by his design, Mr. Khrushchev is enabled to continue dictating the terms of the world's dialog.

I see little sign of any challenging approach in positive terms to our problems at the present time. In the most radical and revolutionary epoch of man's history, the dominant concerns of our leadership have been almost wholly defensive. We have not been urged and spurred on by the positive opportunities of world building and nation building inherent in our position as the most fabulously endowed people mankind has ever seen. On the contrary, our foreign policy has been dominated by fear of communism, our domestic policy by fear of inflation. Economic assistance programs have been sold to the American people chiefly as a means of checking the Communists, never as our creative part in extending our technological revolution to the rest of mankind. The spur to our exploration of the solar system has not been our restless desire to extend the boundaries of human knowledge. It has been the irritation of seeing the Russians hit the moon first. Our interest in greater excellence in research and education flared up not because we want every free citizen to exercise to the full his innate talents and capacities, but because the Russians are producing more scientists and technologists than the West.

Even where we accept the Soviet challenge—as I assume we do in defense, science, and education—our sense of urgency is not yet sufficient to override our obsessive fear that, in some way, in spite of having a gross national product of almost $500 billion and a per capita income almost twice as high as any other country's, we are staring bankruptcy in the face. How otherwise can we explain the fact that, with over twice the Soviet Union's national income, we have let them outpace us in arms, in space research, in proportional spending on education? How else are we to explain why our leaders see their most urgent task not in telling us the realities of our world and the duties and opportunities that lie ahead for a great and confident nation, but in warning us of all the insidious ways in which it can spend itself into penury?

The time has come to put an end to this unnatural timidity. There are other ways of securing a "sound dollar" than by stunting our national growth or—much worse—stunting our aspirations and our confidence in the great aims of our own society. Let us not measure our essential security, our standards of education, and our public needs by what we can afford. This is a static concept. What we could afford with a national income of $250 billion is not the same as our capacity today with nearly double the figure. Nor does it measure what we could afford if our rate of growth were purposefully increased.

Let us rather assess our needs—our need to maintain equality of strength, in missiles and men, until controlled disarmament takes its place, our need to double our spending on education, our need for wider research, our need for decent and gracious cities where segregation and delinquency give ground in the wake of redevelopment and renewal, our need to conserve our national resources—above all, water, the most basic of them all.

All these needs—domestic, foreign, and military— will cost more money, at least until we can make some progress with disarmament. But keeping the budget down is not as imperative as keeping our heads up. It is worth noting that before the Korean war thoughtful men solemnly declared that if the military budget rose above $15 billion capitalism, democracy, and the American way of life were doomed. Then came the war. The military budget was tripled. And now, once again, the present level of spending is being defended with the same ideological fervor.

I think our needs could be covered by existing tax rates at higher levels of economic growth. But I am sure that if our political leadership defines the tasks with clarity and conviction, we will approve what is necessary to fulfill our national purpose whatever the sacrifice—higher taxation in years when the private economy is running at full stretch, for instance, budgetary deficits in times of slack, restraint upon wages and profits to slow down inflationary pressure, less emphasis on sectional interests, more on the common good. The recompense will be to see American society once more the pace setter in human affairs, to see freedom once more the great challenger on the human scene.

For this, surely, is the crux. An attitude of unadventurous conservatism cannot stand for long as the creative image of freedom. I tremble for our future—and for the world's future—if growth, thrust, initiative, and the vast new frontiers of science are felt to be the prerogative of Communist discipline and drive—if "the shot heard round the world" has been silenced by the shot round the moon.

Freedom is not an ideal, it is not even a protection, if it means nothing more than freedom to stagnate, to live without dreams, to have no greater aim than a second car and another television set—and this in a world where half our fellow men have less than enough to eat. Today not rhetoric but sober fact bids us believe that our present combination of complacency and apprehension, of little aims and large fears, has within it the seed of destruction, first for our own community, and then for the larger hope that, as science and technology bring the nations inescapably together, freedom, not tyranny, will be the organizing principle of the society of man.

I end where I began. I believe the United States is ready for a new awakening and the achievement of greater goals. Within it are the moral and material elements of new purpose and new policy. It is the task of leadership to marshal our will and point the way. We had better start soon for time is wasting.

BENEFITS FROM AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM TO ABSENTEE OR CORPORATE-TYPE FARMING OPERATIONS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, on several occasions I have emphasized that a substantial part of the benefits of our present agricultural program accrue to the large corporate-type or absentee farming operations.

Today I am incorporating in the RECORD a list of the 1958 crop price-support loans on cotton of $100,000 or more as compiled by the Department of Agriculture.

Three of the largest of these received more in price-support loans on cotton than did all of the farmers of the four States of Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania on all of the crops they produced in that same year.

The large firm of Anderson, Clayton & Co. received $707,907.71 in Government loans on cotton it produced. This is nearly twice as much as was received by all the farmers in the States of Delaware and New Jersey on all crops they produced that year.

One of these large corporations, the Delta & Pine Land Co., Scott, Miss., which received price-support loans of $1,212,699.80 on its 1958 cotton crop, is a wholly owned British corporation.

Why should this wholly owned British corporation receive more assistance in the form of price-support loans on its 1958 cotton crop than did all the farmers of the great State of Pennsylvania on all the crops they produced?

Why should our taxpayers support this British-owned corporation in its farming operations here in America? Remember, all this is being done under legislation enacted in the name of our small farmers.

It is argued that the taxpayers do not lose under this program because these price-support loans are often repaid to the Government as the cotton is moved into commercial channels. That is ridiculous. In many instances the cotton is turned over to the Government as full payment for the loan, and remember that on that portion which is sold in commercial channels and where the loans are repaid by the producer those sales are subsidized by the U.S. Government. Under its cotton subsidy export program, our Government is buying through commercial channels this same cotton at artificially high prices and then subsidizing at the taxpayers' expense its exports.

In the past 3 years the Government, under its export subsidy program, has purchased over 16 million bales and then exported this same cotton at a direct loss to the American taxpayers of over $800 million.

This is an average loss of over $20 for every bale of cotton which has been produced in America during the past 3 years. Therefore, the fact that many of these loans are being repaid does not mean that the Government is not losing money on these transactions.

These loans are being repaid by sales in commercial channels only by reason of the fact that the Government is spending nearly $300 million annually in supporting our domestic cotton market at its artificially high level.

Nor is this extravagant program actually helping the cotton farmer. In addition to wasting millions in paying for those subsidies, under our present programs we are seeing our domestic market for cotton goods destroyed.

Synthetic fibers are replacing our cotton and wool fabrics. Foreign imports are replacing our domestic products. The final result is that the cotton industry and our American textile industry are both being destroyed.

Last year I sponsored an amendment which the Senate adopted placing a limitation on the amount of support loans any one individual could obtain. This amendment will be in effect on the 1959 crop year; however, I regret that in conference this amendment was watered down in such a manner as to create a grave doubt as to its real effectiveness.

Our whole farm program needs a complete overhauling. Congress by failing to face this situation and by continuing these high price supports on cotton and other crops long after the war ended and long after our need of increased production had passed has created a monstrosity, and now it has a responsibility to correct the situation. But it cannot be corrected by any piecemeal legislation.

There can be no justification for continuing support at the taxpayers' expense of these million dollar farm operations whether they be in cotton or in any other crop.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD a list of the 1958 crop cotton price support loans of $100,000 or more as furnished by the Department of Agriculture. This tabulation includes only loans made on the 1958 cotton crop. Many of the companies listed in this report also received price support loans on other commodities.

Also, in order that other States may see what assistance their farmers get under this program as compared to the assistance given some of these large corporate-type operations, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a chart giving a breakdown by States on all loans made on the 1958 crops.

There being no objection, the list and chart were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME PERTINENT FACTS ABOUT THE DEMOCRATIC POLICY AND STEERING COMMITTEES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, while the question of the selection and makeup of the Senate Democratic policy committee, and the steering committee appears to be settled for this year, it will be little short of catastrophic if we do not reorganize these committees next year if, as we hope, we will have a Democratic President urging a liberal legislative program on the Democratic Senate. With this in mind I should like to reiterate for the Members of the Senate and call to the attention of the press some pertinent facts about the present composition of the policy and steering committees.

There were several points in the course of the discussion yesterday which were not reported by the press, and I believe it to be desirable to call to the attention of the Senate and members of the press certain facts relating to the present composition of the policy and steering committees.

On the policy committee the States north of Alabama and east of the Mississippi River, which contain 58 percent of the national population, are represented in the Senate by 23 of the 65 Democratic Senators, and have 297 out of 537 electoral votes. On the policy committee they are represented by one Senator out of the seven members, or one out of nine if the two ex officio members of the committee are included—or two out of 12 if the members of the calendar committee, who sit with the policy committee, are included. While these five Senators meet with the policy committee, it is not clear whether they have the status of voting members. Taking the maximum possible representation, these 21 States are represented by my distinguished and beloved colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. GREEN] and our youthful and energetic colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART].

On the steering committee the States north of Alabama and east of the Mississippi River are represented on the 15-man steering committee by 3 Senators, the distinguished junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] and the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

These committees are obviously neither representative of the Democratic majority in the Senate nor the Democratic majority in the country.

It is also obvious that, while it has been decided that the policy committee is not to formulate policy for the Democratic Party in the Senate, there is at present no other mechanism short of the conference itself. The standing legislative committees cannot make policy for the Democratic Party; in many instances the standing committees give an opportunity to Democrats clearly not in accord with the Democratic majority in the Senate or in the country to join with members of the minority party and the administration in frustrating the legislative program of the Democratic majority.

Now that it has been decided that conferences will be held more frequently than in the past, it is imperative that the conference be used as a device for formulating Democratic Party policy on major issues.

It is of the first importance that a Democratic Senate be prepared to cooperate with the next Democratic President in passing a liberal legislative program. We must, therefore, consider making those changes in the policy and steering committee next year which we have failed to make this year.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, a tabulation of the States east of the Mississippi and north of the Alabama line showing the number of electoral votes and the number of Democratic Senators.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Electoral votes	Democratic Senators
Connecticut	8	1
Delaware	3	1
Illinois	27	1
Indiana	13	1
Kentucky	10	0
Maryland	9	0
Massachusetts	16	1
Maine	5	1
Michigan	20	2
New Hampshire	4	0
New Jersey	16	1
New York	45	0
North Carolina	14	2
Ohio	25	2

Tennessee	11	2
Virginia	12	2
West Virginia	8	2
Wisconsin	12	1
Total	297	23

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What the Senator has said about the representation north of the Alabama line and east of the Mississippi is correct. However, I think he should also make it plain that so far as the policy committee is concerned, it does not make policy. All it does is to expedite legislation which has been agreed to in the proper legislative committees.

Mr. CLARK. That subject was discussed yesterday. The name is being changed now, as I understand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is correct. The majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], agreed to the motion by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] that consideration should be given to this subject, in order that the true duties of this committee may be made plain.

To me it seems immaterial from what part of the country a Member comes, if legislation is expedited. Again I say that, so far as I am aware, there has been no holdup of legislation. I believe that, in comparison with similar committees elsewhere, this committee has really made an excellent record.

The Senator from Pennsylvania mentioned another item which I intended to discuss with him. I have forgotten what it was, but it had to do with the second or third paragraph of the statement which the Senator made.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator refer to the steering committee?

Mr. MANSFIELD. No. I refer to a portion of the Senator's statement preceding his discussion of the steering committee.

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to engage in colloquy during the morning hour, if I may have unanimous consent to proceed further.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Pennsylvania be allowed to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What I had in mind was the statement that the Senator did not know whether the members of the calendar committee, who have been sitting with the so-called policy committee for more than a year, had the right to vote in the committee. They do have the right to vote, in the same sense as have the secretary of the Senate majority, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], and the Senator from Montana, who sits with that committee as majority whip. In other words, their views are taken into consideration. They are asked to make their views known, and when the time comes for a vote, it is taken by the full committee, and not by the majority leader. The Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HART], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] do vote. I wished to make that clear.

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to have that elaboration of information from my friend from Montana. I regret very much that I find myself in disagreement with him. I am sure this will be one of the few times during the present session when we shall be in disagreement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. What is the Senator in disagreement about? I have stated the record as the Senator endeavored to do when he made his statement.

Mr. CLARK. I take it my friend from Montana is not in accord with the statement I made for the RECORD.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is not accurate. The Senator made certain statements, and I added something to them. The Senator stated that he wished the press to have the true story about the policy committee, what its functions are, and what responsibilities its members have, including the three members of the calendar committee who were added to it last year.

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to learn that we are not in disagreement.

THE INTEREST CEILING

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the President of the United States recently said in his address before the joint session of Congress:

> In the management of the huge public debt the Treasury is unfortunately not free of artificial barriers. Its ability to deal with the difficult problems in this field has been weakened greatly by the unwillingness of the Congress to remove archaic restrictions. The need for a freer hand in debt management is even more urgent today because the costs of the undesirable financing practices which the Treasury has been forced into are mounting. Removal of this roadblock has high priority in my legislative recommendations.

Will the Congress of the United States change its attitude, or will it continue in its stubbornness?

Already our failure to act has created what one writer said was "one of the catastrophes of the century." "Nothing like it," this writer said, "was ever perpetrated by the politicians of either party."

Now, who is this writer? He is our old friend David Lawrence, one of the shrewdest columnists and evaluators of facts this country has produced. He calls attention to the fact that the Democratic National Committee called this 5-year, 5-percent new issue a bankers' loan.

But it did not turn out that way. The general public and the people outside the financial houses bought up this issue.

In other words, it was not the banks, it was the people who saw that this was a good buy. But it cost the Government at least a half percent more than it would have had to pay if, as David Lawrence said, the Treasury could have sold a 10-year bond.

The money which was put into this recent issue, as we said, came by and large from the small investors. As a result, there was interference with funds which otherwise would have been available to the small businessman and private borrowers.

I think, Mr. President, we ought to get down to business and face this problem head on, before we find ourselves in the same boat with the Canadian Government, whose securities are selling at 6 percent and the British Government who had to pay 7 percent at the banks. If by our failure to act we put the Treasury into a straitjacket we had better act and get the Treasury out of the straitjacket.

I ask unanimous consent that David Lawrence editorial be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FRAUD ON THE TAXPAYER—INTEREST CEILING HAS RAISED THE COST OF MONEY

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—Few people are noticing it—largely because it's difficult for them to get the facts—but the taxpayers of America are suffering a huge financial loss.

More of their tax money will be used because the politicians of the Democratic Party in the last Congress wouldn't permit the Government to sell its long-term bonds above a 4¼-percent interest rate.

This is one of the catastrophes of the century. Nothing like it was ever perpetrated by the politicians of either party. It's a deliberate interference with financing the national debt.

The Democratic National Committee, anticipating the criticism that is bound to ensue, declares that the latest offering by the Treasury of 4-year 10-month notes at a 5 percent interest rate is a bankers' bonus and that the notes would be bought largely by bankers.

But it turns out that the general public, and buyers outside of financial houses, came flocking to the Treasury to buy the new issue. The non-institutional buyers gobbled up the bonds and asked for more. They recognized that it was a good purchase.

The tragic fact is that the Treasury could have sold a 10-year bond for a 4½-percent interest rate if the Congress had only authorized the Treasury to use its own discretion in meeting the market.

What the politicians have done is to compel the Government to concentrate on issues of securities that will mature in less than 5 years. This means that the Government will have to pay higher and higher rates to refinance in the next 12 months some $76 billion of short-term securities.

Certainly this is going to cost the Government more. The Democratic Party's advisory committee is right in claiming that this will influence other interest rates—on house purchases and other long-term buying. This needn't have happened.

Actually, the Treasury is being forced to interfere in the realm of borrowing where consumers and small businessmen need credit. The Government thus absorbs short-term funds that otherwise would be available to private borrowers, at lower interest rates.

If the Congress had not yielded to the unsound doctrines of a few of its low-interest zealots, who thought they saw good political issue in keeping the ceiling on interest rates, the Treasury could gradually have reduced the amount of short-term debt. It could have put much of the borrowing on a longer-term basis. This would have stabilized the entire interest-rate structure and held inflation in check, and strengthened the dollar.

The crisis in interest rates is not confined to America.

The Canadian Government is selling securities at 6 percent, and recently England had a 7 percent borrowing rate at the banks. With such conditions internationally, it was a grave mistake for Congress to put the U.S. Treasury in a straitjacket.

It will do the Democrats no good to cry out that the administration is boosting interest rates to help the bankers. The impression building up now is that the Democrats are irresponsible.

The bungling of the interest-rate problem has done more to hurt the Democratic Party in 1960 than being charged with excessive spending and an unbalanced budget.

AMERICAN SAMOA: REAPPRAISAL OF U.S. POLICIES

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, at the close of the first session of the 86th Congress last year, the chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], requested the distinguished junior Senator from Hawaii [Mr. LONG], to serve as chairman of a subcommittee to study the problems of American Samoa. The Senator from Hawaii subsequently traveled to Samoa for an on-the-spot view of Samoa's conditions.

The trip of the Senator from Hawaii and his report are particularly significant at this time since New Zealand has agreed to grant complete independence to West Samoa by 1961. Thus we are faced with the necessity of reappraising U.S. policies in neighboring American Samoa.

The Senator from Hawaii summarized his findings in an article written recently at the request of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin. In order to call it to the attention of all Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the article written by the Senator from Hawaii be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTICLE BY OREN E. LONG, U.S. SENATOR FROM HAWAII

(NOTE.—Senator LONG has written this article at the request of the Star-Bulletin to sum up impressions and comment on American Samoa, which he visited recently on a swing that took him to Australia and New Zealand on the south and Manila, Philippines, on the west. A resident of Hawaii since 1917, he has been superintendent of public instruction, secretary of Hawaii, and held many other important public posts. President Truman appointed him Governor of Hawaii in 1951 and he served until February 1953, when he was succeeded by Samuel Wilder King. He was elected U.S. Senator in the first Hawaii State election last July.)

When anyone hears his family praised he experiences a glow of satisfaction. This is equally true when a citizen of a nation hears his country praised.

It has greater significance when the words of approval come from a people whose expression of faith is based on actual experience.

I recently had this satisfaction. At the close of the first session of the 86th Congress the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, JAMES E. MURRAY of Montana, asked me to serve as chairman of a subcommittee to make a study of American Samoa.

He stated that since I represent Hawaii, the State nearest Samoa, and particularly since I was the only member of the entire committee who had firsthand knowledge of this important community in the South Pacific, I was the logical member to conduct the study.

Because of the nature of his request and of my longtime interest in Samoa, I was pleased to accept the assignment.

CHANGES IMMINENT

Important governmental changes in the Samoan group are imminent. This made it urgent that the situation in American Samoa be reviewed at this time.

The people of the Samoan Islands, although a single ethnic group and of the same general culture, are divided socially, politically, and economically.

West Samoa with a population of approximately 100,000 is British (under a New Zealand trusteeship) and American Samoa with a population of 23,000 is under American control.

A development of international importance is now under way in West (British) Samoa. For a long period of time the people here have aspired to independence.

Under the wise tutelage of the New Zealand Government they have made great progress.

Their economy is self-sustaining; roads and other public improvements have been developed; educational facilities are far advanced.

DESIRE INDEPENDENCE

Of greater importance, they have demonstrated considerable ability to govern themselves and are united in a desire for independence.

In this aspiration they are following an age-old tendency. They feel as did our forefathers that "* * * they are endowed by the Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Holding this view it is only natural—and proper—that they should wish to institute a government of their own to assure that these rights will be secured.

The New Zealand Government has endorsed their hopes and has agreed that complete independence should be granted in 1961.

Naturally, there are critics of this action. Such critics hold that the people are not yet ready.

The emergence of a new nation is an inspiring event. Time will surely show that the West Samoans are ready to begin the great experiment.

NO REASON TO WAIT

During the last half century 22 new nations have been born. If each had waited for complete readiness there would not have been any change in the family of nations.

Independence presupposes experience in self-government, but complete constructive independence is never attained on a certain day. It is the result, rather, of experience and growth.

The chairman and members of the Interior Committee, the committee charged with the responsibility for governing territories and possessions, have naturally asked this question:

"What effect will the granting of independence to West Samoa have on the people of East Samoa?"

POSSIBLE RESULTS

They could see three possible results:

1. The people of American Samoa might see in the independent status being attained by their brethren in West Samoa an opportunity to unite all Samoans into one social-political group by their joining the new nation to form a Greater Samoa. This would seem to be a logical development.

2. The people of American Samoa, inspired by the fact that West Samoans are attaining their independence, might desire to become an independent nation, either now or sometime in the future.

3. The people of American Samoa might wish to remain American, working out their social and economic problems within the American system, but with a greater degree of self-government than they have been granted heretofore.

It was these three possible developments that I wished to discuss with Gov. Peter Coleman and his staff, with members of the legislature, and with the chiefs.

STAY WITH UNITED STATES

Their attitude was all the same. There is absolutely no thought of any political future apart from the United States.

This viewpoint was set forth eloquently by every speaker, whether a chief was speaking or a member of the legislature.

Rapi Sotoa, president of the senate, and A. P. Lauvao, speaker of the house, were equally forceful and clear in their interpretation of the desire of their people to be always a part of the United States.

They pointed out that the American influence has been strong in East Samoa since 1839 when Capt. John Wilks first visited the island.

President Sotoa said, "We are American. We were born under the American flag. Our homes, our churches, our schools are in the American pattern.

"We want to participate in the affairs of the nation—to help others. We aspire to the same place that other Americans have."

The various leaders with whom we conferred, spoke forcefully, not only in relation to their devotion to America; they also spoke pointedly in presenting their ideas as to what they expect under the American system.

WANT CONSTITUTION

They are especially interested in the following:

1. A constitution at the earliest possible date. They feel they are too much governed by men rather than by principles laid down in governmental documents.

2. The new constitution should protect the Samoan in the ownership and control of the land. This is of supreme importance in view of the limited land area and the unfortunate examples in other parts of the Pacific of native peoples losing their land.

3. Pending the adoption of a constitution, legislative powers should be granted to the legislature. The present two-house legislature serves only in an advisory capacity to the Governor.

This falls far short of the ideal of self-government and is no longer satisfactory.

This is true particularly since the people of West Samoa and also the people of the Cooke Islands have legislative control over all local questions, including local taxation.

4. More aid should be given by the U.S. Government, particularly in connection with education and health, roads and airports. This seems reasonable in view of the extensive aid that is given to the various States of the Union and to foreign nations.

5. Assistance is needed in developing a more adequate economy. The completion of the new runway for jet planes will have a bearing on tourism.

The present fishing cannery which employs 450 people can be enlarged.

The greatest need is for financial assistance in providing fishing boats capable of competing with the fishing craft used by other fishermen in Samoan waters. They hope that a carefully selected committee will make an on-the-spot study of the economic possibilities of the island.

AID PROGRAM

I am already working actively to promote a legislative program designed to give assistance to East (American) Samoa. Many people who know that situation feel that since the Navy withdrew in 1951 the economic situation has deteriorated.

While in New Zealand for conferences with officials responsible for governing territories, I met Congressman SILVIO CONTE, of Massachusetts.

He spent almost a year in Samoa during World War II. He has kept in touch with developments there and feels strongly that the United States should be more concerned about the welfare of the people.

Adm. Herbert G. Hopwood, whom I met in Fiji as he was returning from an inspection trip from Little America at the South Pole, expressed a similar viewpoint. He feels there should be a greater interest in this group of loyal Americans.

The Samoans need help to plan their economic future. The Civil Aeronautics Board should be more active.

The Fish and Wildlife Service (Bureau of Fisheries) should be of assistance. The services of agencies concerned with the planning and building of roads and the improvement of education and health facilities should be made more available.

There are two specific areas where the Federal Congress should act during the 86th session:

1. Provide adequate financial support to assure the completion of the runway now under construction which is designed to handle jet planes.

2. Assist the Samoan authorities in the completion of the constitution on which they are already working and secure its adoption. A new constitution granting greater powers to the legislature is a necessity.

If these accomplishments are brought about, two important steps in relation to the development of Samoa will have been taken.

Of greater importance, these people who for generations have thought of themselves as being a part of America will feel they are receiving something of the consideration which they merit.

I thoroughly enjoyed the privilege of meeting old friends in Samoa and of making new ones.

Anyone who has been there will remember the beauty of the scenery, the colorful kava ceremonial which is always provided, the friendliness of the people; but most of all he should be aware of an opportunity for America to assist a people who believe in the United States and who want to be a part of it.

INCREASED MARITIME FREIGHT RATES FOR ALASKA

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, this is the fourth day since increased maritime freight rates were imposed upon Alaska and Alaskans by a verdict of the Federal Maritime Board. The Alaska carriers, as was explained to the Senate on Monday by my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], and myself, waited until the forepart of December to ask for a 10-percent rate increase. The State of Alaska, under the auspices of Gov. William Egan, intervened and asked the Federal Maritime Board to withhold any action until a public hearing had been held—a hearing, if you please, which would give an appropriate basis for a judicial determination.

Instead of acquiescing in that appropriate and proper request, the Federal Maritime Board allowed the rate increase to become effective January 11, and simultaneously allowed a public hearing, but said that if at a later date the increases are found to be unjustified, the money will be returned to the shippers.

My question is: What about the consumers in Alaska, who have a principal interest and a principal stake in this action? Will the increases they pay ever be returned to them? Of course not; that would be mechanically impossible.

Yesterday, as a member of the Subcommittee on Aviation of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] is the chairman, I listened to General Quesada, Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency, testify. I should like to quote one paragraph from his statement:

> By the very nature of things, however, the special interests of many of these groups are often in conflict with each other. More importantly, they are often in conflict with the "public interest." Our job, then, often becomes one of balancing the equities among these groups and the great body of the general public, which, incidentally seldom has a vocal supporter. The public is traditionally silent and must often look to Congress and the bodies it creates to pursue their interests.

Mr. President, I can only express the wish now that the Federal Maritime Board had been equally solicitous about the public interest in the maritime trade of Alaska.

THE SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on Thursday, January 7, I introduced, on behalf of myself and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], a bill to make additional Commodity Credit Corporation funds available for use in the special milk program for children for the remainder of this fiscal year, 1960, and to provide additional funds for 1961 to meet the natural expansion of the program. The bill asks that $5 million be authorized to bring 1960 available funds to a total of $85 million, and that the 1961 authorization be increased to $90 million.

Mr. President, the special milk program has been one of the most successful programs to be authorized by Congress and administered by the Department of Agriculture in recent years. It was initiated in 1954 in order to expand the market for the abundant production of the dairy farms of this country, and at the same time fulfill our responsibility to improve the nutrition of our schoolchildren by providing them ample supplies of milk.

In 1959, the children in more than 81,500 schools, nursery schools, settlement houses, summer camps, and other child-care institutions, drank 2.2 billion half-pints of health-giving milk provided under the special milk program. This fact in itself is convincing proof of the need for this program.

In the spring of last year, the Department of Agriculture found the authorization of $75 million inadequate to maintain the program at the established rate of Federal reimbursement to the participating institutions. Congress acted immediately to authorize an additional $3 million so that children would not be forced to pay higher prices or possibly be denied an adequate supply of milk.

At that time, I asked that the appropriation for the special milk program be increased for each of the 3 years, 1959, 1960, and 1961, at an expanding rate to meet the growing number of children enrolled in our schools.

The actual administration of this law by the Department of Agriculture has been excellent. Administrative procedures have been worked out to encourage broad participation by schools and institutions. The policymakers of the Department of Agriculture, however, have attempted to hold the program back—in their own words, "to stabilize the program" by holding expenditures at the level of $75 million annually. Such action would not result in a stabilization of the program. It would mean a gradual diminishing of the program in real terms, since the number of schools and number of school children continue to rise. Even though successful, the program at present reaches only about half of the schools. Instead of being satisfied at this level, we should be seeking ways and means to reach more and more child-care institutions.

The bill which was approved by Congress did not meet my original recommendations. As enacted into law, it provided $78 million for fiscal 1959; $81 million for fiscal 1960; and $84 million for fiscal 1961. The inadequacy of last year's legislation was revealed in November, when the Department of Agriculture informed the schools and institutions taking part in the special milk program that on March 1 of this year the reimbursement rate would be cut by half a cent per half pint of milk because funds were insufficient to maintain the Federal share of 3½ and 4 cents per half pint of milk.

The bill introduced by myself and the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY] last Thursday would prevent this planned reduction in the reimbursement rate by making immediately available $5 million from Commodity Credit Corporation funds for program operation during the remainder of fiscal year 1960. The special milk program for children would continue to operate at its present level. Children would not have to pay more for the milk they drink. Schools would not have to reduce their participation in the program, or juggle their funds to meet the need for milk by cutting down on other essential activities.

Also, this proposal would, by providing an increased authorization for 1961, prevent the necessity for Congress to be faced with the same situation 1 year from now.

Representative LESTER JOHNSON, champion of Wisconsin's dairy farmers and chairman of the Dairy Subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture, has introduced a similar bill in the House of Representatives. Hearings on the proposal will be held by his subcommittee later this month.

Mr. President, I am sure that all of us know that this program is of tremendous value, both to the health of our schoolchildren and to the welfare of our dairy farmers. We need to act promptly on this proposed legislation in order to insure the continued successful operation of the special milk program.

OLD AGE WITHOUT FEAR

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have been pleased to note that more thought and study is being given to the problems of our aged citizens. Due to the wonders of modern medicine and pharmacy, the lifespan of citizens has been steadily increasing. With these great advancements, however, new problems face us as to how we may best provide happy and secure lives for the elderly.

An excellent series of articles reporting on the problems of the aged and on current efforts to meet the needs of these people, appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune. The author of the articles, Daniel J. Hafrey, is a Minneapolis Tribune staff writer who specializes in reporting on welfare matters. I take this opportunity to commend Mr. Hafrey for this excellent series of articles, and also the Minneapolis Tribune for giving this issue the attention which it deserves.

I ask unanimous consent that the series of articles be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GROW OLD WITHOUT FEAR—CLEARER VISION FOCUSES ON AGING

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—With the White House Conference on Aging scheduled for early 1961, the Nation is giving increasing attention to its growing number of senior citizens. This is the first of a series of articles on recent developments in the field of aging.)

(By Daniel J. Hafrey)

Donald K. will be 65 the day before Christmas. New Year's Eve he will leave the lathe he has tended 35 years for the last time—never to return to work.

And Donald K. is not afraid of retirement and old age.

The modest home in north Minneapolis is paid for. With the children gone long since, it is a little big, but Mrs. K. loves her flower beds, the nearness to the church where they were married 41 years ago, the familiar stores in the shopping center where she knows what shelf to find the things she needs.

She wouldn't think of moving to an apartment. Years ago Donald K. lightly suggested moving in with their oldest married daughter when he retired. She almost blasted him out of the house and he hasn't spoken of it since.

Mrs. K. has a bad back and can't do the heavy cleaning. But two daughters and a daughter-in-law take turns helping her with that. For the rest she takes a fierce pride in keeping—by herself—as spotless a house as any of the younger women.

Donald K. has high blood pressure and two fingers are gone from his left hand—a memento of a careless moment at the machine many years ago. But he sleeps well, has a hearty appetite, enjoys an occasional nip and keeps up with the younger men on hunting and fishing trips.

PENSION MODERATE BUT ADEQUATE

The savings are meager. With modest wages, three children to put through college, Mrs. K.'s mother to be kept in a nursing home the last 8 years of her life, a small lake cottage near Alexandria and a reasonably new car to be maintained there wasn't much left to put by.

But between his company pension and social security, the K.'s will be getting $245 a month. He has $15,000 in life insurance. And both will remain covered by the Blue Cross and Blue Shield health insurance policies taken out through K.'s employer.

Active in their church since newlywed days, the K.'s hope to continue working for it. Mr. K. plans to put in more time in his garage woodworking shop. Mrs. K. has a passion for old-country embroidery work and her eyes still are good and keen so she can keep it up. There are relatives to visit in several parts of the country.

Donald K. and the 1,000 other Americans who will turn 65 on his birthday—some 360,000 a year—are among the vanguard of our citizens beginning to reap the benefits of our maturing approach to the problems of aging.

For the first time the country is beginning to grasp the size of the needs of the aging, today as well as tomorrow, confident that it is well within our capacity to meet it.

CLEARER PICTURE OF NEEDS EMERGES

No longer are thoughtful people overwhelmed by the mushrooming numbers and demands. The dust of exaggerated worry, fear and concern is settling and a more realistic, factual picture of our senior citizens and their needs is emerging. Instead of chaos there is beginning to be understanding and planning. To be sure, this is only the very beginning.

A tremendous amount needs to be done. In many cases we are only glimpsing the direction in which we should move. In many others we haven't even found the direction yet. There are mountains of heartache, privation, illness, and loneliness on the part of hundreds of thousands of oldsters.

Yet, the most vital fact in the lives of America's 15,500,000 citizens over 65 today is that for the first time in history real grinding poverty—extended hunger and cold and inability to get medical care—largely has been banished.

Over the past 10 years there has been a veritable revolution in the way retired persons maintain their income: while 10 years ago 2 out of every 10 retired workers got social security, veterans benefits, or Government pensions, 7 out of 10 get such payments today.

Thus for the first time in history the majority of a nation's oldsters are dependent for their support neither on children and relatives, nor yet on the Government, but on a retirement fund they and their employers have financed.

PENSIONS SHOW GENERAL INCREASE

In addition to social security, more than a million retired workers also are getting private employer pensions.

The average social security benefit today is $72 a month. Three out of every 5 persons 65 or older have an income of less than $1,000 a year. Obviously, this doesn't go far in these days of 69-cent ground beef and 27-cent cigarettes.

But more and more thought is being given to gearing social security benefits not just to earnings in the long-ago past but also to the current price level—which would maintain purchasing power—and even to the wage level—which reflects the rising American standard of living.

A number of reputable economists agree that the American economy, with its rising productivity, can support a 50-percent increase in the income of the retired without missing a step.

And, finally, a determined attack is being launched on the most stubborn financial problem of old age: the high cost of medical care.

Nor are the moves slowed by the growing respect for the political power of the over-65 group. More than half the States now have offices dealing with problems of the aged. In 1961 a nationwide White House Conference on Aging will be held.

AGED REPRESENT POLITICAL FORCE

The retired today command 15 percent of the votes. They have been described as a political force second only to the farm bloc.

This comparison may be more apt than appears at first glance. For the slipping power of the farm bloc in Congress illustrates in some ways the different nature of the power of the aged.

It is not the naively crude Townsend movement of the 1930's, setting the aged apart as a pressure group whose interests are opposed to those of the rest of the population.

The power of the aged today is much more subtle. For America appears to be turning away just a bit from its worship of youth, physical vigor, and productive work. Note is being taken of the assets of other age groups.

It is only the barest beginning. Too commonly, as Dr. Maurice E. Linden, of Philadelphia, Pa., has said, there is a widespread tendency among people to regard progress through life as an uphill development from infancy to some vague plateau or prime called middle age, followed by a general decline.

There is a slowly growing realization that the older person, though declining physically, has a unique contribution to make to society through greater experience and wisdom, that mental development can continue past the physical prime.

The view toward which we may be moving hopefully has been expressed by Bernard Baruch, who calls retirement the greatest achievement of our scientific civilization.

The stereotype of the older person who is ill, penniless, and in need of help slowly is being displaced. Dr. Wilma Donahue, of the University of Michigan, and Clark Tibbitts, of the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, who have done pioneer work in bringing on this change, make this point:

Age does not mean sickness and poverty. The new view of aging is that it can be a great social achievement.

As the educational level of those retiring rises and as more persons reach 65 who have had leisure time during their working life, the problem of how to spend retirement time becomes more manageable. It long has become plain that fishing and sitting in the rocking chair are not enough—and increasingly those reaching retirement have more varied interests.

GOLDEN AGE NOW OBJECT OF RESEARCH

As revolutionary as any of the recent changes is the growing recognition that old people are not all alike and cannot be treated as one uniform lump of "golden agers." It is accepted now that a personality at 65 is the result of development all through life and that personality differences between two 72-year-olds may be more important than their similarity of age.

The scientific tools of research and experimentation which have been so spectacularly successful in other fields now are being turned on the question of what "meaningful maturity" is, how to provide a useful and valuable substitute for work which will permit the retired person to hold up his head in pride.

Retiring at the end of this year, the Donald K.'s can expect to enjoy a period of retirement—maybe half as long again as their working life—with a reasonable income.

With better working conditions they enjoyed while employed, with better nutrition and easier homemaking, with radical new steps in preventive medicine and rehabilitation they have an even chance of fair health.

The likelihood of either one of them having to go to an institution such as a nursing home or home for the aged is only 1 in 33. And the chances that they may live out their lives without a disability which would interfere with normal activity is better than 4 in 10.

RETIREMENT AGE FUEL FOR DEBATE ON PROPER TREATMENT OF AGED

Should men and women be permitted to go on working at 65 or should they be forced to retire?

The extreme positions in one of the most hotly debated issues in America's attitude toward its aging today can be summed up thus:

Pro: The only fair way to end a man's working life is by fixed retirement age—say 65, or 67, or 68. Then everybody is treated equally, without favor or prejudice.

Con: A fixed retirement age is an irresponsible waste of the Nation's valuable manpower. And it may do shameful injury to a man who is perfectly capable of turning out good work for years. The only way to retire is to judge each person individually.

While there are some signs that Americans are beginning to accept other values beside those of productive work, holding a job still is the badge of self-respect for an overwhelming majority.

The urgency of the question is underlined by these figures: in 1890, more than two-thirds of all American men 65 and older still were in the labor force. By 1955 this proportion was just a little over one-third. For women this figure had risen from 7.6 percent to 10.3 percent.

The U.S. Census Bureau has figures indicating that older men in the work force will be less than a third by 1975 and that their proportion will continue to decline. The proportion of older women may stabilize around 11 percent.

HOW TO MAINTAIN INCOME IN OLD AGE

What every man of 65 facing retirement knows has been stated thus by Philip M. Hauser, University of Chicago sociology chairman:

"The great increase in the number of older persons and decrease in their productive activity poses, of course, the major economic problem in respect to old age—the problem of maintaining income flow in later years."

This holds true despite vast increases in social security and other pension coverage. For even under the best circumstances they provide only a fraction of the income a worker and his family have gotten used to during his working life.

There are many reasons for the drop in the share of older persons at work. The numbers of self-employed craftsmen and small businessmen who in the past worked as long as they could lift a finger have dropped sharply.

In largely agricultural 19th century America there was room for a man to gradually quit work, so that a farmer of 65 or 70 or 75 could work as little or as much as his strength permitted. In today's urban economy a man generally is fully employed or out of work.

The urban way of life, which has so vastly increased the proportion of the aged in the population by reducing birth and death rates, also has broken down traditional patterns of respect, affection, and often prestige which the elderly enjoyed in rural America.

SKILLS OF OLDER PERSONS DEVALUED

Workers now approaching retirement age have lived through profound technological changes which may have made their job skills, once commanding good pay and status, valueless.

At the same time scores of new jobs have sprung up for which the older worker is completely unprepared. As the educational level of the general work force rises the older worker again is at a disadvantage, for he often quit school early or had no schooling at all.

In all, Hauser says, "Urbanism as a way of life has tended to leave the older person relatively insecure, dependent and with an ill-defined position in the social order."

While the family and community supports which the elderly enjoyed in a more stable rural society have been weakened, the practice of enforced retirement has spread. Increasingly employers, particularly the large industrial concerns which employ such a large share of American workers today, adopt the fixed retirement age.

To a degree, this mirrors depression demands to put older workers "out to pasture" to make room for the young. Today as well, union inflexibility at times makes it hard for the older worker to transfer to an easier job or part-time work.

And all this doesn't start the day a man turns 65. The problem of the older worker often starts at 40.

FORCED RETIRING CALLED LEVELER

Persuasive arguments have been made against forced retirement. Maybe the best comes from Dr. Walter Alvarez, himself forced to retire from the Mayo Clinic because of age, who has made a successful second career in his seventies as a writer.

Retirement, Alvarez says, should be an individual matter and geared to the health, vigor and productivity of each individual worker. Tests can be set up to measure these things, he says.

Clark Tibbitts of the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare calls the mandatory retirement age the "bulldozer which levels all men."

In many cases, he says, it needlessly deprives a man of work; it is bad for his mental and physical health, takes away his right to live in decency and self-respect and violates the concept of individual differences between men. For work today, Tibbitts notes, still is the "core around which our lives are organized."

He also points out that the fixed retirement age keeps people working who really should quit. By making retirement age flexible, he argues, those who really aren't capable of producing even a few years before reaching 65 would get out sooner.

On the other hand, H. G. Kenagy, who now teaches at Texas A. & M. college after retiring from a successful business career, argues that no board today really is competent to judge whether one man is more capable to go on working than another.

U.S. NONPRODUCTIVE RATIO HAS DROPPED

And, he asks, what happens to the self-respect of a man who is told that he must retire while a man of his age with whom he may have worked 30 years is permitted to stay on?

He challenges the belief, anyway, that most people want to go on working indefinitely. There comes a time in life, he says, when enough is enough and a person should be entitled to do what he pleases instead of going on with the drudgery of a lifetime job.

The Federal Government just recently has contributed some ammunition to backers of fixed retirement.

Opponents of fixed retirement have argued that the national economy could not remain in good health if a shrinking number of productive workers (ages 20 to 64) have to support growing nonproductive age groups (below 20 and over 65).

Recent figures by the census bureau have brought out that this proportion has dropped rather than risen. While there were 94 nonproductive persons for 100 productive ones in 1900, the figure now is 82 for 100.

This is because the average worklife of the individual, with longer life and better health, has been extended by 10 years and large numbers of middle-aged women have entered the work force.

FEWER JOBS SEEN FOR THOSE RETIRED

Various attemtps are made to increase employment of the over-65. Some States, such as Massachusetts, have laws prohibiting job discrimination because of age. A similar proposal failed in the last Minnesota legislature. Numerous public and private commissions also are working in the field.

On the whole, though, it looks as if employment of the elderly will continue to go down. With retirement income becoming more adequate, the elderly may have to look for their satisfaction elsewhere than in work. Says Alvin M. David of the Social Security Administration, who has as much to do with the subject as anyone:

"A great deal has been said to the effect that work is necessary for health and that retirement, for many, leads to deterioration, unhappiness, and illness. We are not so sure as we once were that this is true.

"In a recent Cornell University study it was found that the typical correlation between retirement and health is that people in poor health tend to retire, and not that retirement adversely affects health. The conclusion of the study was that retirement does not typically have an ill effect on the individual."

MORE WORK NEEDED ON SECURITY PLANS FOR THE AGED

This will be your financial picture if you reach 65 in 1970 and become one of America's 19 million retired persons:

Nine out of ten of the retired will be getting social security, veterans benefits, or other Government pensions.

The average social security payment will be $100 a month, almost half as high again as today's $72 average. Maximum family benefits may be as high as $350.

There will be health insurance for all over 65, to pay hospital, nursing home, and medical bills.

In the last 10 years America has become the first society in history where long-term, starvation poverty has been banished from the lives of most older persons.

Yet, President Eisenhower said in his 1956 economic report: "Too many families and individuals still have to get along on incomes that are inadequate by American standards. The Federal Government can do a great deal to help people who have been left behind in the onrush of progress."

Few are more likely to be left behind by that progress than the elderly, a group which has emerged in large numbers for the first time only with industrialized, urban society, and medical progress.

INCOME OF AGED SHOWS INCREASE

In 1957 half the aged living alone or with nonrelatives had an income of $900 a year or less. Eighty percent had $2,000 or less.

But even that is tremendous progress compared to 25 or even 10 years ago. In 1934 the elderly, forced to quit work by illness or company policy, could turn for support only to children, relatives, charity, or public relief.

The great revolution in income maintenance has come with social security which by 1950 supported 2 out of every 10 retired persons.

Today some 9,300,000 persons 65 and older are getting social security. Another 1,600,000 are entitled to it when they or their husbands quit work. This makes 7 out of 10.

Eligibility to get social security benefits at age 65 has grown from 75 percent of the work force in 1952 to 90 percent now. It still is spreading. And as coverage grows, old-age assistance and other relief programs decline.

Private pension plans have grown apace. By the end of 1957 about 17,700,000 workers were covered by private plans. A million and a quarter were getting benefits, many in addition to social security.

WITH INCOME GOES INDEPENDENCE

Thus for the first time the great majority of the retired will have an assured income which they themselves have helped build up. And for the first time they will be able to say proudly that they are dependent on no one.

Savings are not likely to play much of a role in financing retirement. Savings of the retired are skimpy, with half the social security recipients in 1957 having assets of $600 or less, outside of the home they may own. At today's prices, especially the prices of medical care, this doesn't go far.

Now that the income floor, the avowed goal of the social security system, has been reached for a majority of the aged, thoughtful people are beginning to look beyond.

WELFARE EXPERT SEES CHALLENGE

Wilbur Cohen, of the University of Michigan, who helped set up the social security system in 1934 and is one of the Nation's leading public welfare experts, says boldly that the challenge before us now is:

How to expand social security coverage so it will cover everyone who works regularly.

How to expand the program so that every retired aged person is eligible for benefits.

How to raise the level of benefits so that every aged person will be able to live in a manner reasonably close to the standard of living of other groups in the community.

How to finance hospital and nursing home insurance coverage and other medical care protection for every aged person.

The Nation's growing productivity should make possible more generous treatment of our aged without shortchanging education, aid to the disabled, children, highways, foreign aid, and other essential programs.

A 50 percent increase in social security benefits, Cohen says, would be in line with an expected 50 percent expansion in the national product by 1970.

PRESSING NEED: MEDICAL FUNDS

The most pressing need of the aged today is how to meet medical costs. The over-65 age group is about three times as prone to illness as the younger groups. With their reduced means, the average yearly cost of medical care for retired Americans is $125 a year now.

But only 40 percent of the aged, compared to 70 percent of the general population, have health insurance. While it can be expected to grow, coverage likely will fall far short of taking in all those needing it.

There is strong feeling now that all the aged will have health insurance one way or the other soon. If private enterprise will provide it, so much the better. But if private enterprise won't, the reasoning goes, Congress won't be able to resist the pressure for enacting the Forand bill or a similar law.

Representative AIME FORAND, Democrat, of Rhode Island, now has a bill in Congress to provide nursing home, hospital and physician's insurance to all those covered by social security. It would cost 1 added percent of payroll to finance a program of limited benefits. The key is that it would be paid for in advance, during the worker's productive years, for use after 65.

In testimony last month, the Eisenhower administration opposed the bill.

GROUPS ARE AGAINST GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

The American Medical Association, the Blue Cross and Blue Shield organization and the private insurance industry are moving ahead to head off some of the pressures for a Government program. They are testing ways to provide cheaper medical care and cheaper insurance coverage for the aged.

The chief difficulties with commercial insurance programs are: Often those who need it the most are the poorest insurance risks and can't get it; and often an individual is covered only while he remains with the employer who took out the policy in the first place.

While there is general pressure for broadening social security benefits, few of those who know the needs best favor removal of the retirement test.

Cohen agrees with Alvin M. David, Assistant Director of the U.S. Bureau of Old Age and Survivors Insurance, that there are more important priorities. Only 20 percent of those now getting social security would benefit from the removal of the test.

Present law limits benefits which can be paid to a person earning $1,200 a year and bars benefits to anyone earning $2,080 or more.

BENEFITS RESTRICTED TO LOWEST INCOMES

About 300,000 persons now earn between $900 and $1,200 a year and presumably restrict their earnings in order to get full social security. Another 200,000 have earnings between $1,200 and $2,080 and get partial benefits. Then there are 1,400,000 persons over 65 who still work full time and have earnings large enough to exclude them from social security.

If the present retirement test were removed, most of the extra money would go to the latter group. A sizable increase in social security contributions would be required to finance this. And while it might be argued that these people are entitled to living as well as they can, David says, there are needier groups.

The most urgent need, he and Cohen agree, is more adequate benefits to widows. Aged women outnumber men in this country and of all women 65 and over today, 55 percent are widows.

With an average social security grant of $72 a month, widows now get 75 percent of the primary grant, or $54. It is felt that this should be raised to 80 or 85 percent immediately and up to 100 percent as soon as possible. There also is backing for reducing the age at which a widow can start getting benefits.

More liberal benefits will be financed partly by the scheduled increase in social security tax. Five percent of covered payroll today, it will go to 9 percent in 1969. In addition, Cohen advocates raising the portion of wages subject to social security from the present $4,800 a year to $9,000.

Good Health, Self-Sufficiency Brighten Future of Aged

No longer does age mean infirmity and illness for everyone.

Men and women reaching 65 today may look forward to living in retirement half again as long as their whole working life, in many cases in reasonably good health and self-sufficiency.

The 1957 national health survey found that 43 percent of all persons over 65 had no illnesses or disabilities which interfered with their normal activities. Only one out of every six was severely enough disabled to require assistance with daily living.

While there still is too much ill health and suffering among the aging and aged, only 3.1 percent of the Nation's 15,500,000 persons over 65 live in institutions such as nursing homes, State hospitals, and tuberculosis sanatoriums.

Medical science, which first extended our average life span to 70 years by conquering infectious disease, now is not only seeking cures for the chronic, degenerative diseases of old age but finding ways to head them off.

Two big areas in giving better health to the aged now are preventive maintenance and rehabilitation.

Preventive Medicine Can Save You Years

How preventive maintenance works was described to the University of Michigan's recent conference on aging by Dr. C. John Tupper of the university's medical faculty.

The periodic health appraisal examination for university employees which Tupper heads has turned up 848 unsuspected defects among 563 professors over the past 2 years. Age of the professors ranged from 31 to 81 and about half of the defects required immediate attention, Tupper reported.

Just as an example, the periodic exams uncovered 13 cancers in 12 of the professors. Two of these men are dead today, but 10 are well, according to all medical evidence, thanks to early treatment.

"Medicine today is not capable yet of dealing with the degenerative and neoplasic (cancerous) diseases of advancing age," Tupper said. "Hence the great need for early detection and prevention."

Nor is it enough to start thorough medical exams when a person approaches 65, he stressed. Degenerative diseases develop gradually over a person's life. And the earlier they are tracked down, the better are the chances of cure.

The need for regular medical examinations starting in early middle age cannot be overemphasized, he concluded.

Rehabilitation Can Provide New Outlook

Rehabilitation and physical medicine are another aspect of health maintenance, explained Dr. Max K. Newman, director of the Detroit Institute of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation.

Eighty-five percent of chronic complaints—caused by strokes, arthritis, and rheumatism, among others—can be removed by giving a person early rehabilitative treatment. Amputees, too, of whom there are sizable numbers among the aging, can benefit greatly from rehabilitation.

"If we see a stroke victim early enough," Newman said, "he will never show up in a nursing home. And oldsters who once used to die after hip fractures, we now have walking in 7 days."

Rehabilitation and physical medicine are ways of helping the patient use his physical faculties to the fullest possible extent. They include physical and occupational therapy, heat treatments and various baths, social service, speech therapy, vocational counseling and psychological help. Instruction in the use of artificial limbs also is included.

Rehabilitation should help a patient with chronic tendencies before they become a "way of life," said Newman. "Some older patients are glad to accept a disability as an excuse for 'giving up.' A good rehabilitation service can cope with that, too."

Close integration of rehabilitation with a hospital's psychiatric service is important in such cases, as well as a number of others, Newman added.

Physicians Study the Nature of Aging

Britain, where physical medicine is part of many general hospitals, is considered the leader in this field today.

In the United States it has been pioneered by such men as Dr. Frank Krusen of the Mayo Clinic, Dr. Howard A. Rusk of New York and Dr. Frederic J. Kottke, head of physical medicine at University of Minnesota.

The American Medical Association now favors inclusion of physical medicine services in all general hospitals. Minneapolis' Fairview Hospital has been the leader among Twin Cities private hospitals in this field.

While the practical day-to-day work to make the aged healthier goes on physicians are deep in research in order to understand better the nature of aging.

One of the most ambitious projects is the regional center for the study of aging at Duke University, financed by a substantial grant from the National Institutes of Health. Under the direction of Dr. Ewald W. Busse, Duke psychiatry head, the total resources of all the university's departments are focused of fundamental research.

Much can be done to maintain the health of the aged by a proper diet, said Dr. William D. Robinson of the University of Michigan Medical School. Nor is it always true that appetite wanes with increasing years.

One study in an old-age home, he said, found that the residents ate as much bread as recruits in a navy boot camp, once they were given all the soft, attractively presented bread they wanted.

Tea-and-Toast Diet Has Led to Senility

The importance of a properly balanced diet to mental health also has been stressed by Dr. William F. Sheeley, head of psychiatry at Minneapolis General Hospital. While head of Hastings State Hospital he observed that many of the aged patients who had been committed as senile bounced right back once they started eating properly.

Their only trouble, he says, was that they had lived too long on a tea-and-toast diet.

Following up on this idea, the Community Welfare Council of Hennepin County and the Minneapolis Gas Co. have run nutrition clinics for the elderly which have attracted large and enthusiastic audiences.

New insights are being gained into other causes of the high rate of mental disorders among the aged. Men and women who are perfectly well while engaged in their jobs and busy daily routines collapse mentally under the strains that come with retirement, said Dr. Moses M. Frolich, University of Michigan psychiatrist.

The increasing stresses of giving up a job, losing friends and associates and having to adjust to the lower social status of idleness often lower a person's capacity to cope with the world, he said.

As America learns to accept the worth of a life of retirement, as more meaningful activity is found for such a life, we can expect the rate of mental illness among the aged to decline, Frolich concluded.

Finally, Dr. Frederick A. Coller, noted Detroit surgeon and emeritus professor at the Michigan Medical School, made the point that the lives of many aged persons are extended and made happier by surgery that never would have been considered even 20 years ago.

"We can do almost any surgery now with safety up into the seventies, eighties, and nineties," he pointed out.

Much of this, he said, is due to vastly expanded experimental medicine and the development of special surgical teams, such as the world-famous Lillehei team at University of Minnesota for heart surgery.

Inadequate Housing Is a Plague to Aged

Frank and Agnes D. are in their early seventies, with married daughters in California and Texas and a son with the Regular Army in West Germany.

They live in their southeast Minneapolis home, which they bought for $5,400 in 1938 and have long since paid for. When Frank D. retired from his salesman's job they started taking in two to three University of Minnesota students as boarders.

"We're going to stay right here as long as we can," says Frank D., "unless I can talk the wife into buying a trailer and trying one of those Florida retirement villages."

Catherine F. is 78, widowed 7 years. Her arthritis gives her quite a bit of trouble and the steps in her two-story home near Lake Street and Bloomington Avenue sometimes are too much for her to manage.

For a few years after her husband died, Mrs. F. had an elderly cousin from Willmar, Minn., living with her. But there were disagreements over what to cook, how to clean house. And Mrs. F.'s friends didn't feel comfortable with the cousin. So she went back to Willmar.

Mrs. F. knows she can't stay alone in that house much longer. Her married daughter in Richfield wants her to come live with her, her welder husband, and their three children.

"I like them too well for that," says Mrs. F. "I'm going to sell this house—the children don't want it—and move into Ebenezer Home. Several of the women from my church live there and like it well."

John R., who is 74 and never married, is recovering in a nursing home from a broken hip. He broke it when he fell on the badly lighted stairs of his near-downtown boarding house. He's going back to the dingy, overcrowded bed-sitting room and kitchen.

But not for long. John R. has his name on the waiting list for one of the high-rise apartments in the Glenwood redevelopment area. There he'll be paying $32 a month for an airy, modern efficiency apartment.

"It's a good chunk out of my $71 relief check," he says. "But it's a sight better than what I have now."

HOUSING IS PRESSING NEED FOR U.S. AGED

There has been growing recognition that decent, suitable housing is one of the most pressing needs of the Nation's 15,500,000 over-65 group.

"Studies have shown that social problems, such as disease, extended illness, suicide, accidents, mental illness, and isolation occur in high proportion among populations living in deteriorated housing and disorganized neighborhoods," says E. Everett Ashley 3d, of the Federal housing and home finance agency.

"The need for a good living environment is especially important for the elderly who, because of the nature of the aging process, are especially vulnerable to the disturbing influence of unsatisfactory surroundings."

The housing conditions of the elderly were outlined thus to the McNamara subcommittee of the Senate this summer by Dr. Wilma Donahue, chairman of the University of Michigan division of gerontology:

Half of them can't afford the minimum decent housing. As many as 1,200,000 couples live in three-generation families "and most report that they regard this arrangement as undesirable."

"Middle-aged and older people," she explained, "usually capitulate to living with their children only when forced to do so because of long-term disabling illness, absence of income or devastating loneliness brought on by the loss of spouses or other social contacts."

Forty-six percent of the elderly are living as married couples in their own households; another 24 percent are not married but serve as heads of households; the other 30 percent live in homes for the aged, State hospitals, with relatives or adult children or make some other arrangements.

More than three-quarters are well enough to go on living independently, with only 1 in 5 needing specialized housing where they get help with the activities of living.

INDEPENDENCE IS DILEMMA OF AGED

Only about 3 percent live in institutions. Sixty-eight percent of persons over 65 live in their own homes, mostly paid for. This is the highest home ownership ratio among all age groups. But a larger part of the homes owned by the elderly are in unsatisfactory condition.

Industrialization, the trend to the city and greater mobility have greatly loosened the close ties that used to exist between generations in a family where the old, the middle-aged and the young had a place and useful function. More and more, the average family is made up of young-to-middle-aged parents and their children.

At the same time, people have children earlier, stop having them earlier and live longer. Today the average couple is no more than 50 when the youngest child leaves the home. At that point, the man has a life expectancy of 27 years and the woman of 31.

Thus a third of the lives of a married couple will be spent in a two-person household needing a much smaller home, Dr. Donahue concluded. And almost inevitably one spouse will spend years alone after the death of the other.

Only about 10 percent of those reaching retirement age leave their home community. But even that fraction provides a booming market in retirement villages and trailer camps for the sunshine States of Florida, California and the Southwest.

Increasingly it is becoming clear that the elderly want to continue an independent household as long as possible. And the general public expects them to do so, rather than moving in with their children.

Stiff-backed independence may not be the best thing for the older person, involving, as it must, not only material hardships but the much greater suffering of years of loneliness. Joseph M. Britton of Pennsylvania University, whose research findings support the stress on independent living, has described the dilemma of the elderly thus:

"Present opinion hardly makes acceptance of a helping hand (i.e. living with children or relatives) a graceful thing to do, even when the hand is extended with sincerity and a genuine spirit of loving or friendly assistance.

BUILDERS SEEK TO MEET BASIC NEEDS OF AGED

"And yet, almost inevitably in old age, unless an individual dies suddenly, he becomes less self-sufficient and to a greater or lesser degree dependent upon others. This is a reality of life in these later years."

Since little can be done to change these Puritan-inspired values of our society, there is much we should do to let more of the elderly live by themselves and make it more pleasant for them, he said.

A survey of the New York State division of housing found that one in five elderly patients in New York City hospitals could go home—if they had a decent place to go home to. If they had that, the hospitals could provide home nursing care for them—at a great saving in labor, money and self-respect of the elderly patients.

One of the main stumbling blocks to their return home is this, according to Richard W. Hill, Jr., of the division:

"Almost half of the patients have limited mobility and most of them are shut in due to the lack of elevators in the buildings in which they reside. In most cases these people do not live on the ground floor level. Over 70 percent live on the second floor or higher. On the other hand, only 13 percent live in buildings with elevators.

"This block to their mobility can hardly be overstated."

Ability to get outside, home care services for temporary illness, and partial homemaker services are some of the things housing for the elderly should have.

Other desirable features are: complete dwelling unit, including bathroom, on one floor; absence of thresholds and other tripping hazards; doors wide enough to let a wheelchair pass; nonslip surfaces; hand grips by all toilets and bathtubs; a kitchen arrangement which makes stretching and stooping unnecessary.

Housing for the elderly should be located near public transportation, shopping, medical, hospital, and recreational facilities; free from major traffic hazards; in a neighborhood free from urban blight and slums; and in familiar surroundings near the occupant's usual circle of friends.

We know of some of the needs. And much is beginning to be done to meet them. There is a lively boom in construction of a variety of housing for the aged, ranging from a high-rise apartment building for retired teachers in Omaha, Nebr., to the Evangelical Lutheran Church's string of olde-age homes across the country, to the independent family units of Detroit's model Presbyterian village.

Following pioneers such as New York City; San Francisco, Calif.; Cleveland, Ohio, and Toronto, Canada, Minneapolis by fall will have 180 efficiency and one-bedroom apartments at low rents in the Glenwood redevelopment area. The elderly will have preference in renting them.

HOW U.S. HELPS MEET HOUSING NEED

A tremendous boost to providing more ample housing for the elderly was given by Congress in 1956 when it made possible, for the first time, for single elderly persons of low income to be admitted to low-rent public housing projects.

Congress gave authority to the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) to underwrite 90 percent of mortgage loans on projects sponsored by nonprofit groups. The 1956 law also made it easier for persons 60 and older to qualify for FHA-insured loans.

Private homebuilders also are moving into the market. One, Carl T. Mitnick, president of the National Association of Homebuilders, has built 800 units and financed many for retired persons in North Cape May, N.J.

Senior citizens, Mitnick has found, are excellent credit risks.

The scope of the continuing need has been indicated by Mitnick, who says the elderly need 150,000 new housing units annually. And Herbert M. Rosenthal, a Chicago builder, says that housing for the elderly will represent a billion-dollar-a-year market over the next 10 years.

ONCE PHYSICAL NEEDS ARE EASED, BIG QUESTION BECOMES LEISURE

Reasonably good health, enough income to live in self-respect and a decent place to live—these are the foundations of life after 65 to which men and women can look forward without fear.

Although much still remains to be done before these goals are attained, we are moving toward them. But that is only the beginning. The big question now is: once the minimum of physical comfort is assured, what to do with these later years?

Shuffleboard, outings, golden age clubs, checker tournaments, gardening, reading, radio and television take up a good part of the extra time which retired persons have on their hands—at times weighing heavily on them.

A vast community effort is under way across the country to provide activities and entertainment for those who have worked in their fruitful years and now are ready to enjoy the rewards of the high standard of living they have helped create.

For many of the aged this is enough and, if the other conditions of physical comfort are present, they live out their declining years pleasantly and with satisfaction.

But with many others of the aged, Dr. Wilma Donahue of the University of Michigan feels that under their efforts to engage in recreation there is a sense of "filling an inner vacuum which has been created by the leisure time that has been thrust upon them."

The dilemma of the aged in western society, and especially in the United States, is this, says Dr. Donahue who heads her university's division of gerontology:

"Our society has been, and very largely continues to be, family and work-centered. We have assigned roles and social positions in terms of parenthood and work. Now we have created an economy in which these responsibilities are completed while many years of life remain. We invite people to retire. Adult children have little or no need for their parents in the home. But what position have we assigned to these people? How shall they use their energy, time and experience? How shall they satisfy their needs for belonging, usefulness, recognition and orientation?"

Very few are self-sufficient enough to do merely what they think is right and let the opinion of those around them go hang. Almost all of us need the approval and acceptance of those around us, the praise, the pat on the back, the knowledge that we are doing what is considered worth while.

In ancient Greece and most of the non-western civilizations almost up to the present, leisure was a respectable way to fill one's time. The old Greeks put a low value on productive work. They believed that the most worthy use of time was to deal with people through government, service, religious worship and conversation.

But in western society since the Reformation, the stress has been on productive work as the most valuable use of time. It is the Calvinist-Puritan tradition, what the sociologists call the Protestant ethic, of hard work, self-reliance and independence which has built our technological civilization of abundance.

Ironically, it is that very devotion to productive work, which has created the highest standard of living in history and has extended our life span to 70 and more, which now strikes back at the elderly.

For, though there are beginning to be some signs of change, in our society it is hard to win public respect for a man who doesn't work any more, who has been put on the shelf.

"Work has given a man more than income," says August Hecksher, director of the 20th Century Fund which has done pioneer research in the field of aging. "In numerous ways it has provided satisfactions and answered needs, and now the real objective must be to find, not activity in general, not business for its own sake, but activities which specifically fill the void which the ending of the job has left."

MATURE LIVING MAKES DEMANDS

Other societies have accorded positions of respect and honor to their aged, have looked up to their greater experience and wisdom. America, too, with its attitudes still largely moored in a youthful pioneer society, will have to change its approach to age if it is to come to terms with a group that is becoming increasingly important as voters, consumers and setters of public tastes.

Not all the changes have to be made by the younger age groups. To be respected an older person must be more than just old. And the rocking chair-fishing routine as the end-all of retirement is not likely to make a place of honor for the aged in our communities.

Mature living, which has become possible on a large scale for the first time in our lifetime, makes demands on the middle-aged and older persons, too. Woodrow W. Hunter of the University of Michigan's division of gerontology has outlined some of the most important ones:

Selflessness or the capacity to serve one's fellow man. Too often the elderly become preoccupied with their own affairs to the exclusion of everything else. The retirement years, when the cares of earning a living and raising a family are over, present a unique opportunity to serve those less fortunate, including the sick and the institutions serving them and children and youth.

Social expansiveness or the capacity to reach out and create new and satisfying social relationships. One of the great causes of loneliness and separation from the community for the aged is their refusal to make new friends and acquaintances as the old ones, inevitably, pass away.

Other attributes making for a more satisfying retirement are mental alertness, inquisitiveness, flexibility, active citizenship, self-sufficiency in thought, initiative, and the ability to set and realize goals for the remaining years of one's life.

Not enough factual research on what the elderly themselves want to do with their retirement time has been done so far. And much valuable insight into what makes a well-adjusted retirement can be expected from some of the research projects now being carried on.

But one thing is certain: Efforts to do everything and decide everything for the elderly, however well intentioned, are off the mark.

Leonard Z. Breen, Purdue sociologist, has warned against letting the professional organizer make the elderly "public property—fair game for all those who manipulate them" and who think they know best what is good for the elderly.

"We must not take a man out of the pool hall and make a new man out of him at age 65 just because he is 65," he says. "Old people, after all, are only young people grown older. To impose a new, foreign and arbitrary set of values and standards is undemocratic and unfair in any case for no other reason than a man has reached a certain chronological age.

"Let each individual derive from his own life his own satisfactions with appropriate assistance and guidance, but with individual and personal dignity and freedom."

'MEANINGFUL MATURITY' IS PRODUCT OF PLANNING

One of the most persuasive appeals against regimentation of the aged, for consideration of each one as a separate individual was made at the University of Michigan's recent conference on aging by Mrs. Mary C. Van Tuyl.

A retired clinical psychologist who has taught and practiced in California and Michigan, raised six children and now lives at Presbyterian Village in Detroit, Mrs. Van Tuyl made these points:

"The longer I live within a group of older people, the more I am inclined to stress their differences instead of their similarities.

"The range of differences in background and present status is so variable that any generalization is more than likely to be untrustworthy. The amount of economic resources of the older individual, the extent and quality of the formal education he has had, even the character of his childhood and youth, his professional and work history, his present physical and mental health—has he been married? divorced? is his partner living? has he had children?—his church background and his present religious thinking, his personality and temperament, his tastes and appreciation resources, his adaptability to the necessities of change, his degree of independence, of tolerance of other ways of thinking and acting, even the time and the rate at which the most conspicuous physical manifestations of aging appear—all of these are important characteristics that simply pile up to make unique individuals of older men and women."

The richness of resources for meaningful satisfactions that are built up in early and middle life, she stressed, are likely to be the basic reservoir for satisfactions in later life. The whole previous life is a preparation for the later years.

In spite of what others can do for the elderly, she said, the individual's own responsibility for his life plan in the end is paramount. And she concluded her views on meaningful maturity with this story:

"Not long ago I had dinner with a woman recently retired from a successful small business. She was talking of her present activities as if they were giving her great satisfaction. When someone asked her about the difficulties of retiring, she said with some impatience, 'It seems to me that about half the country is trying to teach the other half how to retire. With me,' she said, 'I just gave up going to work 6 days a week plus some evenings and began to do some things I had always wanted to do.'

"The matter probably was not as easy as this comment would indicate, but, she continued, 'If we have handled our affairs well up to this age of 60 or 65, it's quite likely that we can plan for the later years.' "

SCOREBOARD OF AMERICAN SCIENCE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, there appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune an excellent series of articles by Victor Cohn, entitled "Scoreboard of American Science."

Eight years ago Victor Cohn wrote the first series of articles on Russian science in any American newspaper and he stated, "We are badly underrating Russian science." In 1958, Mr. Cohn spent 5 weeks in the Soviet Union and made the following grim observation:

The first year since sputnik the Russians have advanced more in science than we. At the present pace, they will lead us in most important fields of science in 10 years, in the opinion of many informed Americans.

Last year, Mr. Cohn was assigned by the Minneapolis Tribune to see how far the United States had come in science and education since Russia had launched sputnik over 2 years ago. The excellent series of articles which Mr. Cohn prepared is must reading to anyone who is concerned about our scientific status today.

I highly recommend this excellent report, and I ask unanimous consent that the series of five articles along with a chart entitled "A Scoreboard of American Science," which sums up the progress we have made in the last few years, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(By Victor Cohn)

WASHINGTON.—How can we wake up America?

On October 4, 1957—2 years ago today—Russia launched her first sputnik.

Today many leading American scientists are still saying: "How can we wake up America?"

This is the main conclusion this reporter has reached after talking to many scientists, and working with science officials in Washington to compile the first "scoreboard of American science."

This scoreboard appears on this page. It is an attempt to show some of the things we have done and not done since the first sputnik's beep-beeps signaled a new kind of race for world leadership.

The National Science Foundation gave the Minneapolis Tribune generous help in compiling many of this scoreboard's figures and estimates. But several come from other sources, and any errors are ours.

The scoreboard and many recent interviews now show that:

Our Government—by act of the Congress that just adjourned—will increase spending on all scientific research and development in the next year by 6½ percent. An authoritative Washington estimate is that the Russians are increasing theirs by between 11 and 16 percent every year.

Two years ago we were warned that the Russians were spending 8 percent of their national income on education, while we were spending 4 percent. The U.S. Commissioner of Education now estimates that we are spending 5 percent; the Soviet Union, between 10 and 15.

Russia's moon rocket reminds us how far behind we remain in sheer rocketpower. One finds general uneasiness among scientists about our many failures on the launching pads.

There is even sharper worry among our scientists, however, about American basic research and education—for example, about the number of bright youngsters still not getting college educations in fields important to the Nation's survival. We are increasing our scientific and technical manpower supply by 3 to 4 percent a year. Russia is increasing its by 6 to 7 percent.

Our spending on basic research, which after sputnik leaped forward from shamefully low levels, has already started to level off sharply. Most scientists believe it is leveling off before even approaching the level that they believe vital to prevent future surprises like sputnik in unforeseen fields.

Congress—as one example—just put off voting either a go-ahead or starting appropriation for a crucial research tool: a 2-mile-long $105 million Stanford University accelerator or atom smasher. The President in May personally asked approval. Congress did make available about $1 million in AEC (Atomic Energy Commission) operating funds for preliminary design studies. Scientists and the AEC had asked a starting fund of $3 million to $4 million, and urged a congressional commitment to prevent destruction of team-scientists' morale, future delays and loss of keymen.

While trimming a few million here, a few million there from basic sciences, Congress voted the National Institutes of Health—the Government's medical research Institutes—$400 million for the coming year. This is up 36 percent from 1958–59. It is $105,700,000 more than the President asked of Congress. It is more than the Institutes themselves had asked of the President.

The Government's total basic research spending meanwhile goes up this year from $488 to $494 million—a little over 1 percent.

These are some of the reasons why many scientists still worry. Much, they are aware, has happened since sputnik. America's educational support and support of science have moved far ahead.

Science has begun to have a Washington voice. We are building several telescopes, atom-smashers, and laboratories.

We still lead the world in most fields of science, though the Soviet Union's upward pace is ominously faster. Our space satellites have garnered far more new facts than Russia's. Congress last year passed the National Defense Education Act to help some worthy students go to college.

The question is still raised: "Are we doing enough?"

In August 1958 Dr. Alan Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation, wrote President Eisenhower that "only a beginning" had been made, and said "we shall rapidly lose in competition" with other nations unless we show greater effort.

Waterman said a few weeks ago:

"We've made some progress. But I still feel very strongly along these same lines. I don't know how we can bring home to people that there's still a real emergency."

He is worried about real and urgent needs for many fundamental research facilities (like the Stanford accelerator) and for millions of dollars' worth of new labs and equipment.

"I'm still very unhappy about the extent of results in education," he added. "Where I get most unhappy is the lot of the high school teacher. Who's raising his salary and status?

"It's true, New York State has jacked up its schools. So have California and Oregon. Here and there things are happening. But it's awfully slow. We can't wait 10 or 20 years. We haven't got time."

Dr. Bowen Dees, the Science Foundation's Assistant Director for Scientific Personnel and Education, said: "We need to improve education for science at all levels.

"For example, many people in education would point to the thing that resulted in two Presidential vetoes this year—Federal aid for building college classrooms. And we're going to have increasing trouble in education because of increasing population."

On science and education, Dees said: "We still have a very long way to go, not only to catch up with the Russians but to realize our own potential, which, after all, is the American dream."

Economists have begun to stress this point. Disregarding any competition, we are still failing to do enough research and training to increase productivity.

"By and large the Government has shown a grossly inadequate appreciation of the importance of research," said Sumner H. Slichter, Harvard economist who died last week, to a Washington conference last year.

True, he pointed out, research spending has grown, but it has been mainly military, and Government support of other research remains "only a small fraction of the amount that would yield enormous results."

Dr. George Kistiakowsky, new science adviser to President Eisenhower, said in September that we still and regrettably fail to recognize that science must grow faster than industrial production, or production will falter.

In the past year the warnings like these have piled up and up—none of them big stories at the time, some of them just a few lines in a speech, but all of them together making a powerful message.

Dr. Joseph Kaplan, U.S. International Geophysical Year chairman, said that "in spite of the impact of sputnik, no one as yet has stated the magnitude and character of the task." He believed we might have to spend twice as much on science to survive.

Lloyd V. Berkner, chairman of the new space science board of the National Academy of Sciences, asked, "Have the measures since sputnik been adequate?"—and answered: "No."

Dr. James R. Killian, Jr., the President's science adviser until a few months ago—a conservative, mild-spoken man—said in his final official speech in July:

"We still pour too much of our money into development and too little relatively in basic research."

"We face implacable, able competition * * * While recognizing our present strength, we must also recognize that we could lose the race."

"The military, economic and technological competition of the Soviet bloc"—meaning Russia and Red China—"may require us to make some hard choices between growing comfort and leisure on the one hand and self-denial and hard work on the other."

"Our vitality and sense of purpose are under test."

UNITED STATES NEEDS MORE BASIC RESEARCH

WASHINGTON.—Could the United States turn out to be the most cancer-free defeated nation in history?

This kind of question is being asked rather sadly by many fundamental scientists in this country today as the result of their nagging difficulties in getting financial support, compared with medicine's far easier lot.

Many scientists are particularly concerned this fall about the recent experience of two Government agencies: the National Science Foundation (NSF) and the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

NIH—consisting of a national cancer institute, a national heart institute and others—was established both to do research and to allot research grants. For 7 consecutive years Congress has voted it more money than the President recommended.

The Congress that just adjourned gave NIH $400 million for 1959–60, 36 percent over 1958–59, $105 million more than the President budgeted, and more than NIH itself sought.

A few weeks ago Science—the journal of the American Association for the Advancement of Science—said of this: "It may not be possible to spend so much money so quickly without significantly lowering present research standards."

It said many observers will praise the NIH cancer-treatment program, but will find that fundamental biological studies—the kind that medicine needs for future progress—are being short-changed.

The national science foundation was the brainchild of the scientists who gave the United States World War II radar, antisubmarine weapons and the A–bomb.

They began saying in 1945 that if we wanted future strength, we must not do research on weapons alone but must do basic research—the dreaming and thinking and searching for facts that lead both to knowledge and practical payoffs.

Dr. Vannevar Bush, wartime science chief, said in 1947 that NSF should be established immediately and that its support of American research should grow to $125 million in 5 years.

NSF was not established until 1951, and its total research support now totals only $76,800,000, including dollars for research facilities. In almost every year NSF requests have been cut twice, once by the Budget Bureau, then by Congress.

A year ago NSF asked the Bureau to allot it $206 million in the President's 1959–60 budget. This was cut to $160 million. Then Congress this summer voted $152,700,000, having cut out $6,617,000 in basic research funds and $800,000 for a Southern Hemisphere astrograph.

This is a proposed telescope to photograph large sky areas. It was called "vitally and urgently needed" by Dr. Alan Waterman, NSF director. Northern Hemisphere studies now give our astronomers only half the data they need to analyze the motions of stars and planets.

The House of Representatives unsuccessfully sought to cut even more NSF money—$17 million in all. Of the House vote on this, Chemical and Engineering News—organ of the American Chemical Society—observed:

"There was little debate. Nobody urged the House to restore the cuts made by the Appropriations Committee. As he presented the committee recommendations, Representative JOE L. EVINS, Democrat, of Tennessee, said:

" 'The committee is impressed by the importance of science in the modern world, but it does not believe we should issue a blank check to the Foundation.' "

Most scientists think that instead of a blank check, basic science has been issued one of Washington's barest purses.

This reporter was told by NSF's Waterman a few weeks ago: "Last year we were able to support about 35 percent of the worthy research proposals we received. This next year it will be about the same, maybe a little more."

Of $7,700 million which Washington agencies will spend on scientific research and development—to a huge extent on rocket hardware—in 1959–60, only $494 million or 6 percent will be for basic research. This is the same percentage as 2 years ago, the year Russian science shocked us with sputnik.

Russia spends between 10 and 20 percent of its research and development money on basic research, estimates a Washington official who follows Soviet science.

The Atomic Energy Commission's basic research program is inadequate, its top science advisers found in March, at a secret meeting at Savannah River, S.C.

Navy support of basic research should be doubled to make sure of future naval and national strength, said an advisory committee to the Navy in April. The Navy has actually been by far the heaviest basic research supporter among the services.

After sputnik, Lloyd V. Berkner, then a member of the President's Science Advisory Committee, estimated that U.S. research funds ought to grow 5 to 10 times "in the next few years." Basic research spending was indeed nearly doubled in the 2 years following October 4, 1957, when sputnik went up. But now it is leveling off.

Science has become a more routine Washington item this year, and no longer an urgent one. The NSF—for example—was just given a first $2 million to begin to remodel and retool college graduate research laboratories (by 50–50 matching).

This is just the beginning, of course, of what should be a long-range program, but one NSF official still calls it "a pea in the dish." NIH has a 3-year-old, $30 million-a-year program to do the same sort of job for the medical labs.

Most basic research sums are not large as Washington figures go.

"Basic research doesn't cost much," said Waterman. "In fact, doing basic research first is the most economical approach."

Where we fail to do early research and development—as in space—we wind up spending billions to much less avail on crash programs later.

Dr. Charles S. Sheldon, II, technical adviser to the still-weak House Committee on Science and Astronautics, said: "Early research is always cheap, and time is something almost impossible to buy back later, even with almost astronomical spending. Look at our rocket program.

"This House committee has been trying to point out that even a few years' delay in an important science can hurt us very badly later. But getting this across is very hard."

Dr. Wernher von Braun, Army missile scientist, was quoted to Congress by Waterman: "For years we have been talking too much about hardware and too little about filling the vat of knowledge. We have been taking from that vat for years and putting little or nothing back in. Now we are scraping the bottom."

"I think a breakthrough by us is highly unlikely because our research programs are so terribly underfed. A breakthrough by the Russians, putting them even farther ahead, is much more probable."

Many scientists think there are still not enough scientists in high places in Washington to say: "Basic science is important."

This situation, all agree, has improved hugely since sputnik. Before sputnik, Washington's top scientific body—the President's Science Advisory Committee—was an unheeded voice. It met infrequently and did not even report to the President.

After sputnik it began frequent meetings—some of its members are still in Washington almost continuously—and it got the President's ear.

He named a personal science adviser, who became the committee's chairman. In December 1958 a new Federal Council of Science and Technology was named, representing all agencies dealing with science.

A minority of scientists—but only a minority—still think there ought to be a United States Department of Science. Most top scientists disagree.

Many, however, think it foolish that Washington still has less than a handful of scientifically trained men at any decision-making levels, with none in the Cabinet and none on the National Security Council (though Dr. George Kistiakowsky, the science adviser, often sits with it).

In Congress, science as a whole is only beginning to find any place to turn. Before sputnik, there was none. Then both Houses feverishly named special committees concerned mainly with space, though the House group had a broader outlook.

The House this year made its committee a standing Committee on Science and Astronautics (chairman, Representative OVERTON BROOKS, Democrat, Louisiana).

The Senate still has what is in effect only a space committee with limited authority (chairman, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat, Texas, the majority leader).

Many scientists would like to see a joint Senate-House committee on science with the energy and prestige of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Many Americans today think that they are supporting science because they read that we are well on the way to putting a billion dollars a year into space research and development.

"I'm going to Washington to look into the support for basic research," I told a friend, a well-informed citizen, in September.

"Oh," he said, "you mean space stuff."

A psychologist at a scientific meeting this September said: "Man is always looking for a good fairy to solve his problems, and this time the good fairy is dressed in a space suit."

But space science is not all of science, any more than atomic energy was all of science when it was the glamor field 10 years ago. Some other field could be the hot field 10 years or 5 years from now.

America's scientists do not know which field it will be, but they are saying that it's foolhardy and perhaps suicidal for us to continue to leave a large number of gaps.

RUSSIA'S SECRET WEAPON: LACK OF FUNDAMENTAL RESEARCH IN UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON.—We do not know how to make the rockets that we will be needing within a few years.

We do not know how to make future nuclear reactors.

We do not know how to make a practical atomic airplane engine.

We do not know these things, American scientists have been disclosing, because of a lack of fundamental research in what has turned out to be a crucial field: materials. This includes metallurgy, the science of metals.

"My belief is that this is an area where the Russians have more first-class people than we and are training more," Dr. Herbert F. York, Director of Defense Department Research and Engineering, told this reporter.

We have other serious weaknesses. We do not know as much as the Russians about the bottom of the ocean—the terrain of any future undersea war—because we have not done as much fundamental research as they in oceanography.

We did not have the information we needed at Geneva disarmament talks on the potential effects of underground atomic shockwaves. Our scientists had to cull Soviet scientific literature for information on conversion of energy into wave motion in the earth, because of a sharp Soviet lead today in seismology, the science of earth shocks and quakes.

In all of these areas—competent scientists have told this reporter—the Russians are either ahead of us or nearly up to us, and in all they are moving and training faster.

"We are generally lacking information in materials and the whole science of solids—in high-temperature chemistry, high-pressure phenomena, solid state physics and advanced metallurgy," reported Dr. John H. Williams, new scientist-member of the Atomic Energy Commission (and University of Minnesota professor on leave).

This is now showing up in lack of materials to do many present and future rocket and space jobs. Lack of advanced materials for an aircraft nuclear reactor was disclosed this September as one reason why we are still far from the flight of an atomic plane, though nearly $1 billion dollars so far has been spent on this project.

"We don't have appropriately trained people; we don't have basic facts," said Dr. John Kincaid at the Pentagon's Advanced Research Projects Agency. "This is true despite the fact that the Defense Department spends at least $500 million a year and probably a billion on materials development, as part of the contracts for many jobs. This is fantastically wasteful."

So last December a new coordinating committee was named, headed by Williams. It has charted a new program to finance university research and training. Its plans were too late for the 1959–60 budget, but the Defense Department is about to divide $15 million immediately between 20-some universities to start some broad programs.

In oceanography, Russia is operating a fleet of big ships, where we have had mostly converted yachts. Russia also has rebuilt a Navy submarine—the Severyanka or Northern Maiden—into the world's first underseas research vessel. A large part of its job is to study fish movements, which made Khrushchev refer to it as "our herring catcher" during his American visit.

But it can also rest on the ocean bottom for scientists to get soil samples. A Washington official who follows Soviet progress said: "In submarine oceanography, I can tell you that they know much more about the area close to the United States than we know about the area close to Russia."

In February 1959, therefore, a committee on oceanography of the National Academy of Sciences said we must double our support of deep-sea research in 10 years or face economic, military and political penalties. It called for a $615 million, 1960–70 research budget, and 70 new ocean-research vessels of all types.

This too came too late for the Washington machinery to crank into fiscal 1960 planning. However, the Navy has converted a submarine buoy-tender—bigger than a sailing yacht, at least—for ocean research, and another is now being converted. The Navy also has $3½ million for a new 1,150-ton vessel, and the National Science Foundation, $2 million.

Seismology—detection of earth shocks, natural and atomic—suddenly became a hot field when Nevada underground A-bomb tests showed we did not really know enough to detect far-away underground A-tests reliably. The President's Science Advisory Committee last December named a panel on seismic improvement headed by Lloyd V. Berkner, who grew up in Sleepy Eye, Minn.

The panel reported in March that our present activity was modest at best. The Soviet Union, however, was emphasizing seismological research and "enjoying a position superior in many respects to our own." We needed specialists and modern computing methods.

The panel urgently recommended a 2-year research and detection program costing $10,800,000 the first year, $7,400,000 the second, plus $12 million a year worth of underground atomic and conventional explosions to help develop detection.

Again, most of this has been left for future action.

Seismology and oceanography are only two fields of geophysics or earth science. Here in general the Russians are moving swiftly, while support here has been meager.

In meteorology—weather—and the atmosphere, there is about to be published a new National Academy of Sciences report. It will still call this "one of the most neglected sciences of our times," and note that our average number of new Ph.D.'s is about 10 a year, where 50 or 60 are needed.

These things remain true, despite a chain of recommendations started by a National Academy of Sciences 1958 study headed by Lloyd Berkner. The new report will note with approval that basic research support is gradually being increased in line with the Berkner report recommendations.

But more still seems to be needed. A new University Corp. for Atmospheric Research representing 14 institutions called in February for a $1,100,000 1959–60 appropriation toward a new $33 million National Institute of Atmospheric Research. This institute would tackle the big atmosphere-study jobs. It would maintain its own planes to send into storms and approach the kind of research job Soviet institutes are already doing.

"We must reckon with the possibility that some degree of control of the weather ultimately can be achieved," this report warned.

This institute, too, must now await 1960 action, though it will get a $500,000 feasibility study by the National Science Foundation.

There are other weak and underfinanced areas of American science. The President's Science Advisory Committee last December also singled out biophysics, radio astronomy, inorganic chemistry, continental geology, linguistics, social psychology, and several basic life sciences like microbiology, genetics, growth, and the neurological foundations of behavior, as well as sophisticated analytical engineering to precede development billions in many fields.

Obviously several areas of science will be seeking new millions in 1960.

The Government's science agencies are now seeking backing for these from the administration and Bureau of the Budget. Then Congress will face the figures in January.

Many of the new programs, Americans will find, will require a whole new degree of support of graduate training in American colleges. There is an emergency here that has had little attention.

"It is this," said John Williams at the Atomic Energy Commission. "Today it costs on the order of $100,000 to train a Ph. D. in high-energy physics."

It costs between $60,000 and $100,000—depending on the college—to train a Ph. D. in physics, metallurgy, geophysics or any advanced science.

"It's becoming harder and harder to get States to vote money to train Ph. D.'s," Williams said. "And you can understand why. These boys may get their training, then leave for parts unknown.

"I think we have to face the fact that they are national assets. Yes, $100,000 is very expensive. But it is very cheap compared with how much it costs to train a jet pilot."

Dr. Hugh Odishaw—executive secretary of the U.S. International Geophysical Year Committee and of the National Academy of Sciences' new Space Science Board—said: "The colleges are poor. They're in trouble financially. But they've got to expand. Only the universities can bring up the next generation, and somebody's got to help them."

The leaders of science in Washington would like to see far more support of research and education by private givers and industries, so all the money does not come from Government. They have been vainly urging adoption of tax credits to encourage corporate and individual contributions.

The Government would lose some taxes by these credits, but gain more—believe the scientists—by luring some private dollars for activities it might otherwise have to finance 100 percent.

In any case, however, the leaders of science recognize that the Federal contribution is going to have to grow.

Off the record a few weeks ago, one put the situation this way:

"We have had piddling support of basic science long enough now in the United States. And 1960 will be the real test.

"You see, sputnik woke us up a bit in October 1957. But the budget requests for 1958–59 were already in, and they could only be revised piecemeal, though many were drastically changed.

"Then many scientific panels went to work on many problems. In 1959 they started making reports—but too late for appropriations for the fiscal year that started July 1. This is why the crucial tests will be what the administration does to budget requests now, then what Congress does in 1960.

"We'll find out then whether we're going to make any attempt to stay ahead of the Soviet Union in science. We'll find out then whether we're going to fish or cut bait."

RUSSIA MOVES AHEAD OF UNITED STATES IN MANY FIELDS

(By Victor Cohn, Minneapolis Tribune staff writer)

WASHINGTON.—A puzzle about the Soviet space program continues to stump many American scientists:

Why has Russia, despite its great rocket power, despite its new moon rockets, put only 3 earth satellites into orbit, compared with our 12? This has permitted us to lead in gathering scientific facts—for example, about the unexpected Van Allen radiation layers ringing the earth.

Dr. Herbert F. York—director of defense research, and engineering, top scientist in the Pentagon—gave a surprising new answer in an interview here:

"I don't think the Russians have as big a space program as we have.

"They must be putting money into other things—into missiles and other weapons. Into research and development on submarines, nuclear power, metallurgy, building steel mills, education.

"We know they have more submarines. They must have more tanks, more chemical warfare. As a matter of fact, all these things worry me much more than the sputniks.

"I believe too large a percentage of our increased support and attention has been centered on the glamorous things. When I'm questioned in Congress, everyone asks, 'How do we stand in space?' 'When are you going to have as big a rocket booster as Russia's?'

"They don't ask: 'How do all our weapons stack up against theirs—our aircraft, communications, optics?' They don't ask: 'When are you going to have a better submarine? As many cannons? Better antisubmarine warfare?'

"If the only thing we're doing is space, then we're only running a circus."

Russia, it has become increasingly apparent in the past year, has been moving ahead in many things, not just in space.

A report was produced this spring by a high level naval research advisory committee headed by Dr. C. Guy Suits, vice president and research director of General Electric.

The committee included the head of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; the vice presidents or research directors of Douglas Aircraft, Union Carbide, American Telephone & Telegraph, and International Business Machines; the heads of Buffalo, Stanford, and Pennsylvania State Universities; and three members or recent members of the President's Science Advisory Committee.

This report has had little public circulation. It says in plain language:

"The U.S.S.R. appears to be the first nation to fully appreciate the importance of science"—as seen, for example, in its effort in education and the high share of national product spent on research and development.

"The current policy of the Soviet Government appears to be to direct the development of its science and technology toward achieving military, political, and economic supremacy over the United States.

"It appears that currently the United States leads the U.S.S.R. in most areas of physics, mathematics, medicine and chemistry." Russia seems to be "on a par" with us in aviation-space medicine, metallurgy, combustion, theoretical physics, meteorology and oceanography. Russia leads in physical chemistry and many areas of geophysics.

"The important problem, however, is the future." Russia is now training basic research scientists at a rate about 50 percent greater than ours. "Thus, the Soviet potential is increasing relative to ours at an alarming rate."

This conclusion was printed and was being circulated in Washington at about the same time that Vice President NIXON and party were returning from Russia in August.

One of the news magazines reported then that a "new assumption" was "bound to be cranked into high-level U.S. policy decision" as a result of what the Nixon tour saw. This, it was said, was the assumption that "despite sputnik, the Soviet drive to scientific advance is not as far advanced as many Americans believe."

This is far from what most competent American scientists have been saying.

It is true that Soviet achievement is still spotty. Some of her labs are good, some poor. Almost all stand in unbelievably shabby buildings, and such things can puzzle visitors.

But here are some items from recent reports and estimates of Soviet prowess:

1. American visitors have begun finding surprisingly outstanding Soviet work in electronics, which underlies computers, automation and weaponry. At a U.S. war college recently, two TV sets were placed side by side, one a good commercial American set, the other the standard set being sold to Soviet consumers.

The two were turned on. The Russian set's picture was sharper and locked into focus faster, without wavering.

"We build this quality only into our military electronics," said the scientist who told this story. "We have to concede that Russian progress in electronics in the last 10 years has been phenomenal."

2. One Soviet application may become the first successful machine translation of languages. The full scope of Russian research here appears almost incomparably greater than American research, Sonya G. Machelson, of the Library of Congress, told the American Chemical Society in September. In 1955, she said, there were two Soviet institutes active in this field. Now there are 79.

3. A report made for official eyes here covers Soviet solid-state physics, which underlies progress in electronics, materials (for rockets or nuclear reactors) and harnessing the H-bomb reaction for power. "It is difficult to avoid the conclusion," this report says, "that in another 5 or 10 years their basic research output will exceed ours."

4. Another report covers quantum field theory; the mathematical fundamentals of the atom's elementary particles. It says: (1) New understanding here could "provide a basis for the actual manipulation of these forces" exceeding man's manipulation of them to date; (2) "If, as seems likely, the study of quantum field theory continues to attract relatively more physicists in Russia than in the West, the quantity of Russian efforts will outweigh those of the West in the near future."

5. Four astrophysicists who toured Russia reported in April 1959 that Russia is now turning out twice as many astronomers as we, and might overtake us in 15 years in this field where we suffer an acute shortage of people.

Dr. Gerald F. W. Mulders, astrophysicist who is chief scientist of the office of naval research branch at Pasadena, Calif., believes we will be overtaken in astronomy in 10 years unless we make all-out effort.

6. Even on scientific data gathered by space rockets and satellites—where we have been leading—John W. Townsend of the National Aeronautics and Space Agency wrote last January: "At the next international gathering—say, a year or so from now—the Soviet result will be on a par with our results. After that, unless conditions change, the Russians will be ahead."

So go many reports.

Dr. W. A. Nash, professor of engineering mechanics, University of Florida, visited institutes in his field in Moscow, Leningrad, Tbilsi and Kiev.

Then he wrote in the journal, Industrial Laboratories, of decrepit buildings but excellent equipment; of many unique test machines that do not exist here; of teaching-lab equipment that far surpasses that in our best universities.

He said: "We did not find the highest level of basic research in mechanics any better in the Soviet Union than in the United States." But its quantity is now 2 to 3 times ours, and Russia is training so many students that it is almost certain that within 5 to 10 years their efforts will perhaps be of the order of 10 times our present effort.

"Unfortunately, the current indications are that our research effort during that period will increase only by a very modest amount," he added.

This professor's field—mechanics—means the behavior of matter under force. What American observers like him are saying is that the Soviet Union will forcefully manipulate matter, while we do much less.

Future Soviet achievements, then—in the manipulation of matter or the biology of life—may eclipse even moon rocketing.

We are being warned of this plainly. Soviet scientific and technical advances in many fields are likely to be coming with greater frequency, Gen. Charles P. Cabell, Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said in August.

Dr. Edward Teller, "father" of the H-bomb, predicts:

"Ten years from now Russia's position as the world leader in science will be unquestioned. Nothing we can do will change that. All we can hope to do is regain our lost leadership at some later date."

Many scientists are not this pessimistic. But most of them are deeply concerned.

SCIENTISTS WONDER IF UNITED STATES HAS THE STUFF

WASHINGTON.—"My grand concern is for the decline and fall of the West," said Dr. Herbert F. York, Director of Defense Research and Engineering, in his office at the Pentagon.

"The rewards in America are just greater for being an advertising man than being a scientist.

"The enthusiasm and rewards in Russia are for getting ahead of the United States."

York and many other American scientists are more concerned today about the American spirit than about any of our gaps in research or schooling. They ask the basic question: "Do we have the stuff for a new kind of world?"

One of our leading space scientists was brutally frank about our attitude in a speech last week. He described what has become "a fairly typical pattern of American response" to new Soviet feats like moon rockets.

"First," said Dr. W. H. Pickering of NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration)—head of the jet propulsion laboratory at California Institute of Technology—"there is a near-hysterical demand that the Government do something.

"Next, we try to buy our way out of the situation. We form new agencies, appropriate new funds, conduct congressional investigations.

"Finally, the crisis gradually fades away, the public becomes somewhat bored with the whole activity, the new agencies struggle for support, and another scientific achievement is quietly relegated to the history books."

A congressional aid agreed. "People here get excited about something the week the Russians do it," said Dr. Charles Sheldon II, technical adviser to the House Science and Astronautics Committee. "Then they forget about it—people in general and in Government."

Many practical things are worrying our scientific leaders besides spirit.

One is certainly our schooling. A panel of the President's Science Advisory Committee said (on May 23) "doubling our current annual investment in education is probably a minimal rather than an extravagant goal."

In the face of this, a prominent technical journal—Chemical and Engineering News—accurately reported early in the year: "Science education bills will have rougher going this year * * * 'Congress let off its steam for science education last year; it's out of fashion this year.' That's how one committee aide puts it."

Sure enough, little new educational support was voted, though critics noted that the Nation is still short 190,000 teachers, and nearly 75 percent of all high schools are considered too small to support needed courses.

The National Defense Education Act—Congress' and the administration's 1958 response to sputnik—was continued this year at about what in 1958 was called its starting level.

This act was intended to spur production of research scientists as one crucial goal. It has come to the attention of the President's Science Advisory Committee that of $4.5 million in fellowships to some 1,000 graduate students, just 52 percent have wound up in the hands of students of science, mathematics, and engineering.

Graduate fellowships in other fields are necessary too, responsible scientists agree. Colleges must expand in all fields to teach all students broadly. But there is certain to be new argument for doing much more about training research workers than our starting, postsputnik level.

What of public education? The things most scientists now seem to be urging are: (1) continued citizens' action, school district by district, for better schools. ("We have seen how effective this can be," says the National Science Foundation's Director, Dr. Alan Waterman); (2) some move toward statewide minimum standards, to prevent the many laggard school boards from lagging forever; (3) new Federal aid.

Debate about Federal aid to schools has practically ended among scientists. Science—official organ of the American Association for the Advancement of Science—wrote a September 18 back-to-school editorial flatly backing Federal help for school construction.

Support for basic research worries our scientific leaders. The head of American science's big 1957–58 Antarctic program—Dr. Laurence M. Gould, president of Carleton College, Northfield, Minn.—says: "2 years have passed since sputnik, and still our basic research is terribly inadequate. We're spending billions on technology and applications—rockets and missiles—but we still haven't awakened on fundamental research."

There is also concern about many practical applications. There is a large—if largely hushed—amount of concern still about the state of American weapons, in case of large or small wars. The President's Science Advisory Committee has been spending half its time on military matters.

Many scientists as well as military men are concerned with the fact that we have apparently accepted permanent Soviet superiority in many military branches. At this August's American Legion convention in Minneapolis, the Navy's deputy chief of operations for fleet operations and readiness said: "Our budgets have not permitted us to build sufficient new ships to replace World War II ships." He warned of the huge Soviet submarine fleet.

The Marines' deputy chief of staff for plans said: "The condition of the amphibious ships now in the fleet is deplorable." He said the marines have new "vertical assault" methods—using helicopters, aircraft carriers and amphibious vessels—but lack the vessels to use them.

The Army's Vice Chief of Staff described new weapons developed by scientists, but said there are not enough of them or enough men to use them.

At the Pentagon, Herbert York, the Chief Scientist, made it clear that he is aware both of the needs and the fact that someone has to make choices.

"We need a lot more work on weapon development," he said. "We haven't done so much.

"One problem is budgeting. People always say, 'This idea would only cost $100 million. That's a pretty small amount for the United States.'

"But there are 50 such ideas to examine. To do them all we would have to increase the defense budget 50 or 100 percent. I'm not sure that's a bad idea. It might be a good idea. But it's not about to be done."

The decision on how much money to spend on America—on weapons, on education, on science—is not scientists' but everyone's. Many scientists, however, are still asking: "Are we doing enough?"

York said: "We are still ahead now in most things. We are showing some signs of waking up. But whether we actually wake up enough to remain permanently ahead, or only wake up enough to put off the evil day, I don't know. Russia has more people, working harder, on more important things—and it's hard to see how that won't pay off."

So men like York plead for a reawakening of many basic American values: spirit, patriotism, sacrifice, and work.

Some of them have begun to stress a need for one more thing: thought, translated into broader national planning than we have been accustomed to so far.

One speaker along these lines has been Dr. Raymond Ewell, vice chancellor for research of the University of Buffalo, who is more worried about the Soviet Union's industrial threat—and 1965–70, "when their industrial capacity will approach 75 percent of ours"—than about Russian rockets and submarines.

He believes we need:

"National purpose"—"to decide what we stand for" and get out and sell it.

"Positive, dynamic, long-range foreign policy"—to replace passive, defensive foreign policy—including greatly expanded foreign aid "even if it hurts."

Accelerated military preparedness, "even if it hurts."

More money for education and scientific research, "even if it hurts."

"We have the resources to respond to the challenge," says the Space Agency's Dr. Pickering, "We can survive," says Ewell, "with honor and freedom."

However—he and many other American scientists are now convinced—"we have only a few more years of grace."

A scoreboard of American science

	1956–57 (last Government fiscal year before sputnik)	1957–58 (year of the 1st sputnik)	1958–59	1959–60 (appropriations and estimates for Government fiscal year that started July 1)	Comment
Percent of national income spent on education.		In fall 1957, Washington estimated we spent 4 percent of our national income on education; the Soviet Union, 8 percent.		On Sept. 5, 1959, the U.S. Office of Education said the United States is now putting about 5 percent of national income into education; the Soviet Union, between 10 and 15 percent.	All U.S. education—public and private, including colleges—now costs us about $20 billion a year.
Number of new scientists graduated from universities:
B.S. degrees	38,967	42,453		Science and math graduates should total some 45,000 in June 1960. Engineering schools are now worried because fall 1958 enrollment was down about 8,000—13 percent—from fall 1957, though total college freshman enrollment was up 7 percent.	Russia graduated 70,000 to 75,000 bachelors in science in 1958, and 6,400 "kandidats" (like our Ph. D's) in the 3 years, 1957–59. It graduated 94,000 engineers in 1958, 106,000 in 1959, and gave 3,300 engineering kandidats' degrees in 1957–59. This means Russia is training about 2 scientists and 3 engineers to our 1.
Master's degrees	9,427	10,664
Ph. D. degrees	4,168	4,193
Number of new engineers:
B.S. degrees	31,211	35,332	June 1959 bachelors' degrees: about 47,000.
Master's degrees	5,232	5,788
Ph. D. degrees	596	647
Number of able high school graduates still not going to college.			200,000 able high school graduates every year fail to go to college, estimates Rexford G. Moon, Jr., director of College Scholarship Service, agency of the College Entrance Examination Board; 3 in 4 come from low-income groups. Various reports agree between 100,000 and 200,000 graduates in the top quarter of their class are not showing up at college because they lack funds.
Total college scholarship and loan funds available.			It is estimated there are now "at least" a half a million college scholarships of 1 kind or another available in the United States—and that 1 million of our 3¼ million students get $300 million a year in nonfamily support from jobs, loans, and scholarships.		In the Soviet Union almost all college students are subsidized.
New Federal loan program for students.			Congress passed the National Defense Education Act a year ago as the result of President Eisenhower's post-sputnik request. It includes what started out as a scholarship fund but was changed by Congress to a loan fund. This provided $30.5 million last year and will provide the same this year. About 100,000 students may borrow something from it this year. Graduates going into teaching for 5 years are forgiven 50 percent of their loan.		Many scientists still urge new scholarships, charging loans will encourage students to get into high-paying jobs fast, rather than to fill needed research and teaching jobs, which is the act's purpose.
Dollars for scientific research and development (R. & D.).	$8.86 billion worth of scientific research and development (that is, application and engineering) by Government, industry, colleges and others.		$10 billion worth, estimated Alan Waterman, Director, National Science Foundation.		Two important points here: 1. Uncle Sam pays for more than half the country's R. & D., and even the wealthiest colleges depend on the Federal Government for about half of their research funds. 2. Spending went up sharply after sputnik made us realize our efforts in many fields were inadequate. But our extra effort has already started leveling off.
R. & D. financed by—
Government	$5.23 billion or 59 percent of total.
Industry	$3.4 billion or 38 percent of total.	$5.54 billion	$7.23 billion	$7.7 billion
Colleges	146 million or 2 percent of total.
What percent of above is basic research?				This figure has consistently been running between 6 and 7 percent, both for the Nation as a whole and the Government. This low figure appalls scientists who know that only the basic search for facts tells how to make new things: rockets, miracle drugs, weapons, or fertilizers. American industry spends only 3 percent of all its R. & D. funds on basic research.
Federal dollars for basic research.	$254 million	$331 million	$488 million	$494 million	A marked leveling off.
Dollars for the National Science Foundation:
Basic research	$15.2 million	$19 million	$45.9 million	$65.2 million	Dr. Vannevar Bush believed in 1947 that NSF support should grow to $125 million a year in 5 years. NSF research dollars still have reached hardly half this level.
Research facilities	$5.3 million	$6 million	$15.5 million	$11.6 million
Science education	$14.7 million	$19.4 million	$62 million	$64.3 million
Total	$40 million (total)	$49.7 million (total)	$130 million (total)	$152.7 million (total)
Dollars for military R. & D.				$3.8 billion, including $113 million for basic research.	The Defense Department is still basic research's biggest supporter.
Dollars for space R. & D. (not including military missile work).	$55 million	$93 million	$730 million	$882 million, with $210 million of this charged to research, $672 million to development.
How are Federal research dollars spent?				(These figures include both basic and applied research but not development)
For basic biological sciences	$67 million	$70 million	$93 million	$103 million	The physical sciences include basic physics, chemistry, astronomy, geology, geophysics, metallurgy, etc. The engineering sciences also take in many fields—as electronics and computers, just for two. This means the single field getting the most money in the U.S. is medicine. We are beginning to fall behind the Soviet Union in some physical sciences—which that country emphasizes.
For medical sciences	$156 million	$214 million	$276 million	$282 million
For agricultural sciences	$56 million	$60 million	$63 million	$64 million
Total for all life sciences	$138 million (total)	$343 million (total)	$432 million (total)	$449 million (total)
For physical sciences		$333 million	$502 million	$533 million
For mathematical sciences		$40 million	$48 million	$56 million
For engineering sciences		$278 million	$414 million	$509 million
Total	$602 million (total)	$651 million (total)	$964 million (total)	$1,096 million (total)
Federal support of some tools of science:
Accelerators (atomsmashers) and related atom studies.	$26.1 million	$36.5 million	$59.9 million	$80.1 million	Congress failed to vote starting funds for the mile-long Stanford accelerator that President Eisenhower asked.
University science and engineering laboratories.				$2 million (for graduate research laboratories only).	University laboratories are starved for new and expensive modern equipment. Many Soviet laboratories are far better equipped.

INTEREST RATES ON TREASURY ISSUES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 294)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Finance:

To the Congress of the United States:

As I said in my state of the Union message, the Treasury is being prevented from taking debt management actions that are fully consistent with the public interest because of the artificial interest rate ceiling on new Treasury medium-term and long-term issues.

In a special message to the Congress on June 8, 1959, I urged the removal of this archaic restriction on flexible debt management. Congressional inaction on that request has resulted in a much more rapid increase in short-term debt than would otherwise have occurred. As a result, short-term Treasury borrowing costs have risen to the highest levels in several decades and the ability of debt management to operate in a manner consistent with sound principles of sustained economic growth has been seriously undermined.

I deem it imperative, therefore that this restrictive ceiling be removed. I am asking the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Congress proposed legislation designed to attain this objective.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1960.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Mr. ROBERTSON obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] to introduce a bill.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPRENTICESHIP ACT OF 1946

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am very grateful for this recognition for the purpose of introducing a bill for appropriate reference to committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2803) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for voluntary apprenticeship in the District of Columbia," introduced by Mr. RANDOLPH (for himself, Mr. BRIDGES, and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, in sending the bill to the desk I announce that it is introduced in behalf of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], my colleague and present occupant of the chair, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and myself.

The bill is a proposed amendment to the Apprenticeship Act of the District of Columbia. We believe that the transfer of the program from the U.S. Department of Labor to the District of Columbia government will be in the interest of economy and will further the effective administration of the act of 1946, which I was privileged to sponsor when I was a Member of the House of Representatives, and which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] sponsored in the Senate.

When an Apprenticeship Act for the District of Columbia was first proposed, it was contemplated that the U.S. Department of Labor would be responsible for supplying the Apprenticeship Council, to be established under this law, with trained technical and administrative personnel until such time as the planned apprenticeship program under minimum standards was soundly established and able to operate on its own.

Public Law 387, 79th Congress, popularly known as the Bridges-Randolph District of Columbia Apprenticeship Act of 1946, was passed by Congress without opposition and signed by the President on May 21, 1946. The proposed act had the full endorsement of local management and labor unions.

By letter dated August 9, 1946, the Secretary of Labor advised the President of the District of Columbia Board of Commissioners that in accordance with provisions of the Apprenticeship Act, he was appointing the District of Columbia Supervisor for the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training as "Director of Apprenticeship for the District of Columbia," with instruction that he was to "be guided in the performance of his work by the policies and program of the Apprenticeship Council to be appointed under the Apprenticeship Act by the Commissioners."

This program established a six-member labor-management Apprenticeship Council to formulate minimum standards of employment and craftsmanship and operational policies within the framework of the law.

Under the guidance of this labor-management council, within a space of 4 years, the District of Columbia planned apprenticeship program became the most outstanding in the country.

Since 1950, statistics issued by the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training, U.S. Department of Labor, the District of Columbia has had more registered apprentices for each 1,000 journeymen craftsmen reported by the U.S. Census, than any other State or Territory.

Over the past 9 years, the District of Columbia has averaged over 60 apprentices per 1,000 journeymen each year, 20 higher than Connecticut, the second ranking State, and nearly four times the national average.

Under the circumstances, it is felt by those interested in the future of planned apprenticeship in the District of Columbia area that the program is now soundly and permanently established and that it is to the advantage of the future of the program that the Director and his staff should be transferred from the U.S. Department of Labor to the District of Columbia Government, as proposed in this amendment to Public Law 387, 79th Congress.

The proposed amendment was drafted by the Solicitor of Labor at the request of the Secretary of Labor, and has been endorsed by local management and labor unions as being in the best interest of the District of Columbia area and its future industrial skilled labor needs.

In addition, the suggested amendment is also in accordance with the long-standing Federal policy of turning over to the States and Territories those functions and responsibilities which properly belong to local governments and can best be carried out by such governments.

This amendment will permit a fuller and closer integration of the District of Columbia Apprenticeship Council's program and operations and those of the Director and his staff with other District of Columbia government agencies and programs involving the training of skilled and other workers on the job by giving the Council more direct control over local activities. It will also permit the Director and his staff to concentrate all their interest and energy on apprenticeship and on-the-job training problems peculiar to the District of Columbia area in carrying out the Council's policies and directives, and would eliminate all possible conflict between local and national apprenticeship promotional interests.

Furthermore, as the proposed amendment merely involves the transfer of regularly appropriated funds to provide the District of Columbia Council with staff from the U.S. Department of Labor's annual appropriations to the government of the District of Columbia appropriations, it will involve no additional cost to the taxpayers and may even result in a small saving.

In a letter dated January 30, 1959, from James E. Dodson, Administrative Assistant Secretary of Labor, the budget officer of the District of Columbia was advised that the U.S. Department of Labor had appropriated $27,700 for the District of Columbia staff for fiscal year 1959, and $27,800 for fiscal 1960. The present staff consists of a Director, GS–12; a field representative, GS–11; a registrar, GS–5; and a secretary, GS–4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further request for recognition during the morning hour?

THE INCOME TAX AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, last week there were many accounts in the press throughout the country of the death of former Senator Norris Brown, of Nebraska. The central theme of these accounts concerned the part played by the then Senator Brown in introducing in the U.S. Senate the income tax amendment to the Constitution.

While I do not want to take from former Senator Brown, or his memory, any of the credit for his part in this legislation, I was somewhat surprised to see little, if any, mention in press accounts of the part played in the income tax fight by the late Cordell Hull of Tennessee. He was a recognized leader in the fight to impose taxes on the basis of ability to pay. Toward this end, he waged a long and eventually successful fight for income tax legislation.

Mr. President, there appeared in the Memphis Commercial Appeal for January 11, 1960, a column on this subject by one of the feature writers for that great newspaper of the midsouth. I ask unanimous consent that this column by Mr. Paul Flowers be printed in the RECORD, at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAUL FLOWERS' GREENHOUSE

An almost hidden news story Thursday, under the heading "Tax Is His Monument," told of the death of Norris Brown, Republican Senator from Nebraska from 1907–13, and hailed him as the man who introduced the income-tax amendment in the U.S. Senate.

Which is all right, except that it is slightly misleading if it implies that he was more than a fellow toiler in the crusade for the income tax, or that he deserved more than a nominal part of the credit (or blame).

The story sent me back to Cordell Hull's "Memoirs," published in 1948, in which the great Tennessean, father of the good-neighbor policy and diplomat par excellence, who walked with kings nor ever lost the common touch, spelled out the record in Congress for imposition of the levy which now reaches into practically every pocket in the land.

On December 19, 1907, Cordell Hull, according to his own record, introduced into the House of Representatives a comprehensive income-tax bill. As he tells it:

"This was in the face of the fact that all statesmen acquiesced in the view that income tax was probably dead legislatively since the U.S. Supreme Court decision in 1895 declaring the income-tax law invalid. This view was based on the belief that income taxation could not be enacted except through constitutional amendment. 'And with special privilege in supreme control of both Houses of Congress, there appeared to be no chance to secure the submission of an amendment * * * even if ratification by the requisite number of States proved possible.

"By introducing the bill I accepted a challenge. The Republican campaign book of 1894 had stated:

" 'In this country an income tax of any sort is odious and will bring odium upon any party blind enough to impose it. Prepare for the funeral of the political party which imposes such a burden.' I was willing to risk both the odium and the funeral."

Mr. Hull went on to tell how he had been influenced by the ideas of Benton McMillin, Member of Congress from Tennessee, who had embraced the income-tax theory and was author of the tax provision in the Wilson Tariff Act which the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional.

When President Cleveland bypassed McMillin for chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee, the Tennessean determined to retaliate by pushing the income tax over on the East. He was chairman of the subcommittee that drafted the income-tax provision; he forced a caucus and got his provision adopted.

Cordell Hull believed, in 1907, that wealth was shirking its share of the tax burden. He felt so strongly that he plunged in to revive the whole issue, hopeful that absence of Justice Shiras from the High Court bench had altered the situation. Mr. Hull admits that he got nowhere in the 60th Congress, but he wasn't the type to quit.

He kept talking income tax so often to some fellow members that they were no longer willing to listen. Even John Sharp Williams and Champ Clark, he recalls, although in favor of the tax, would turn and walk in another direction when they saw him coming.

When Cordell Hull made his maiden speech on the floor in March 1908, he came out for the income tax, at the risk of odium and political death.

A year later, he introduced his income tax bill on the 1st day of 61st session, in March 1909. Again in January 1910, he thundered:

"The wonderful flexibility and certain productiveness of this tax enables it to meet every requirement of peace or war emergencies." He quoted Gladstone about a similar levy, "an engine of gigantic power." He told how England had used it to conquer Napoleon; how it had been imposed for the relief of a depleted U.S. Treasury in the Civil War.

Followed years of political maneuvering; on February 3, 1913, the constitutional amendment on income tax, so long advocated by the Tennessean, was ratified, and it became effective on February 25.

Cordell Hull does not mention Senator Brown's part. In summation, he wrote:

"After I had written the final draft it went before the House practically as I wrote it. It fell to my lot to handle the income tax provision (of the Underwood Tariff Act) on the floor of the House. The measure was at no time in danger. The provision became law as part of the Underwood Tariff Act (as implementing legislation) on October 13, 1913. The United States now had a regular income tax as a permanent part of our fiscal system. No time was lost in applying it."

So now, as time nears for annual income tax returns, perhaps somebody may care to recall that a rangy, outspoken Tennessean earned whatever odium may accrue from the world's most fabulous governmental revenue producer.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to say that like the late, great Cordell Hull, I am a firm supporter of our income tax laws. I hope they will be strengthened and made more equitable by the closure of many of the loopholes which have crept in during recent years.

I turn now to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

THE CONFERENCE OF DEMOCRATIC SENATORS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion in the RECORD to thank my Democratic colleagues for the very, very courteous and considerate audience they gave me yesterday afternoon in the Democratic caucus. I could not have asked for more attention or more consideration, and I am grateful to have had the opportunity to discuss with my colleagues a problem of deep concern to me. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a copy of the motion which I offered but which was not accepted by the Democratic conference.

There being no objection, the motion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOTION OFFERED BY SENATOR GORE AT THE CONFERENCE OF DEMOCRATIC SENATORS

I move, Mr. Chairman—

That all vacancies occurring hereafter on the Democratic policy committee be filled by election by a conference of Democratic Senators,

That the membership of the policy committee be increased so as to be more truly representative of the Democratic Senators, the major geographic areas of the United States and of the national character and interest of the Democratic Party,

That the Democratic policy committee undertake the development and formulation of legislative policies of the Democratic Party in the Senate to be submitted to the conference of Democratic Senators for its consideration and action.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. If the Senator from Tennessee has a brief statement to offer I shall be glad to yield to him for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to state that we are still in the morning hour. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Virginia, but the Chair did not understand that the Senator from Virginia wished to make a statement of more than 3 minutes.

Mr. GORE. I certainly do not wish to impose upon my good and distinguished friend from Virginia. I have only one additional statement to make. Will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized in the morning hour.

THE INTEREST RATE CEILING

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the President of the United States has sent to Congress another message in which he demands the removal of the interest-rate ceiling on Government bonds.

Mr. President, I opposed the removal of this ceiling last year. I continue to oppose it.

The bond interest rate question is not one which can be considered in isolation. It is part and parcel of the much larger question of overall economic policy. Unfortunately, the Eisenhower administration has tended to center all economic policy around the central theme of tight money and high interest rates.

We have seen repeated failures to keep our economy in balance by raising interest rates and tightening up on the supply of money. This will be the result again and again. Already the housing industry is in a precarious position, and other segments of our economy are sorely pressed with high interest rates and tight money.

I shall soon address the Senate at greater length on the broad economic issues which confront us. I shall show how the interest rate on Government bonds is related to other economic issues. For the time being, let me say that my studies to date have convinced me that it would be a great disservice to the American people for the Congress to remove the interest rate ceiling on Government bonds.

Last year the Congress adopted Senate Concurrent Resolution 13 and thereby authorized the Joint Economic Committee, headed by the foremost economist in the Congress, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to make a study of employment, growth, and price levels. The interest rate on Government bonds, along with related economic issues, has been considered by that committee. The report of the committee will be submitted prior to the end of this month, and I await it with considerable interest.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, has morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been concluded. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SPACE PROGRAMS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe editorials published in the New York Herald Tribune of January 6, 1960, and the Washington Post and Times Herald of January 7, 1960, speak for themselves in indicating why this country cannot ignore the importance of our space programs.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorials be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 6, 1960]

THE GREAT ISSUES OF 1960—SPACE: A RACE WE MUST WIN

Suppose the Soviets landed an expedition on the moon, then declared that the arrival there of any other expedition would be regarded by the missile-armed Soviet Government as an unfriendly act—what would we do?

The new Congress should be asking itself this sort of question as it reviews the scope, organization and priority of the Nation's space program.

Present indications are that unless we quickly and markedly accelerate our own efforts, the Soviets will be first on the moon—and also, despite our dramatic Mercury astronaut program, that the first man in orbit is quite likely to be Russian.

Whether we like it or not, we are in a race—a race we cannot afford to lose.

Conventional military minds may argue that we have our ICBM; that the much greater power represented by, say, the 1.5 million-pound-thrust Saturn project has no immediate military application, and that therefore its development is not of crucial importance in terms of national survival.

But the potential military significance of reconnaissance satellites, space platforms, even moon bases, is only beginning to be explored. Power of the Saturn magnitude, and greater, is needed to hurl aloft the quantity of hardware needed for real space exploration. And operating as it does on the frontiers of knowledge, concerned with the massing and control of vast energies, the venture into space holds the possibility of discoveries the significance of which we can only guess at—and even our guesses will probably fall short of reality.

The space lag could hold a far greater threat to national survival than even the missile lag. We at least have the comfort of alternate deterrents, such as SAC, to set off against Soviet missile power. But against the still unknown threat from future Soviet firsts in space we might have no defense, and not even a good counter offense.

More than the direct military significance of space, however, is involved in our race to get there.

We live in an age in which diplomacy and propaganda, military, scientific, and economic strength all are bound up inextricably together, and in which an anxious world is looking both to us and to the Soviets for leadership.

At the heart of the Soviet Union's drive toward supremacy is its effort to establish an image of the Soviet system as the wave of the future. Spectacular triumphs in space have played a key role—and a highly effective one—in this effort.

If anyone doubts the effect of such triumphs, let him reflect on how the popular image of the Soviet Union has changed in this country since Sputnik I shot aloft, shattering our ill-founded complacency, forcing us at last to recognize the dynamics of Soviet growth.

Our national space agency this year has a budget equal to only one-tenth of 1 percent of the gross national product, while vital space programs have been deliberately delayed for lack of funds. The U.S. space effort is still hamstrung by inadequate financing, by divided authority, by lack of a clear affirmation of national purpose.

From a late start, we have made impressive gains which should not be minimized. But they have still not been enough. We are second, and not even second among equals; we still are getting there—into space—lastest with the leastest.

We can't win unless we start running.

The free world has a right to demand more vigorous leadership than it has gotten from the United States in the competitive conquest of man's ultimate frontier.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 7, 1960]

CHEAPSKATE

The richest country in the world thinks that it cannot afford to compete with the Soviet Union in space exploration. That is the flat implication of the series of articles this newspaper has published recently about the space and missile lag, and it would be an appropriate takeoff point for the new Senate investigation.

Of course the problems of space exploration can be vastly oversimplified, and doubtless there are many factors in the American deficiency beyond mere lack of money. But it is really shocking that the reason given for the failure to use more large-thrust Atlas missiles in the lunar aspect of the space program is cost. Seemingly the administration has not yet fully emerged philosophically from the attitude it exhibited at the time of Sputnik I, which it attempted to pass off as an interesting trick but nothing to get excited about and certainly nothing to warrant greater effort or expenditure.

Very much the same approach has characterized the attitude toward the defense program ever since 1953. The new look, massive retaliation, the bigger bang for a buck all have been essentially rationalizations for getting by on the cheap—with the result that today the United States has relatively little except the big bang. The placid, passive resignation to the missile gap represents a new phenomenon in American history—something bordering upon defeatism which is sometimes candied up with explanations to make it look like one of Hitler's victorious advances to the rear.

The plain, simple, elementary, and obvious fact is that the United States is going to have to spend more money—a lot more of it—in order to assert parity, let alone primacy, in defense and space programs. Better organization and more efficiency no doubt would accomplish something, but there is no use looking for panaceas or regarding waste and duplication as scapegoats. More money for defense space and other national needs is going to require tax adjustments and very possibly higher rates.

Perhaps we can continue to skimp and drift for another year, at which time the efforts to catch up will be more painful. But we are in great danger meanwhile of giving the world, and patricularly the Russians, the impression that we are indeed soft and flabby and that we value our luxuries over our sinews. It will do no good, however, for Congress merely to bemoan the dilemma and use it as a political club against the administration. Congress has the power of the purse and can do something about the problem if it wishes.

THE NEED FOR ADDITIONAL HOUSING LEGISLATION

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, during the 2d session of the 86th Congress much consideration will be given to the question of housing. We already have had statements from the chairman of the Senate and House Housing Subcommittees in which they have set forth their views on this subject. Both of them have taken the position that there is need for additional legislation to promote housing during the sixties.

Until legislation is introduced, the discussion on the subject of housing must be on general lines. But even though my comments are general, I think it is appropriate to set forth some simple facts which we should keep in mind in considering housing legislation this year and in succeeding years.

In the first place, the number of housing starts is high and gives every indication of continuing high, though probably not as high as in 1959. The prewar peak of new housing starts, 937,000 in 1925, was about equaled in 1948, and beginning in 1949 the number of new dwelling units started in every year exceeded 1 million, as shown in the following table:

Estimated total nonfarm new dwelling units

[Thousands of starts]

1949	1,025.1
1950	1,396.0
1951	1,091.3
1952	1,127.0
1953	1,103.8
1954	1,220.4
1955	1,328.9
1956	1,118.1
1957	1,041.9
1958	1,209.4
1959 (preliminary estimate)	1,375.0

It is not easy to make any flat statements about whether this volume of housing is adequate to meet the need for new housing. Many factors enter into the question of need.

The most specific, of course, is the need arising from increases in population and new family formation. The Census Bureau reports that between March 1950 and March 1958 the average annual increase in the number of households was about 850,000.

During the 5 years from July 1960, to July 1965, the Census Bureau's estimates of the average annual increase in the number of households ranges from 643,000 to 1,018,000, varying with different assumptions for population growth and the establishment of households. Apparently, we are more than keeping up with the need from this point of view.

New housing also is desirable in order to upgrade the level of housing and particularly to eliminate substandard housing. It has been pointed out that in 1950, there were about 16.5 million substandard homes, while in 1959 there were about 12 million of these substandard units. This is not satisfactory progress in meeting the need for adequate housing.

However, new construction is, in many cases, neither the quickest nor the cheapest way to eliminate substandard housing. If a dwelling unit is substandard because it needs repairs or because it needs running hot water, it may be far quicker, cheaper, and more efficient to install a hot water heater or to put on a new roof than it would be to build a new building.

Between 1950 and 1956 about 3.4 million substandard dwellings were upgraded. Unfortunately, about 1.3 million dwellings which were satisfactory in 1950 had become substandard by the end of 1956. Greater attention to upkeep would have prevented much of this deterioration. The problem of substandard housing will not be most effectively or completely solved just by more new construction; perhaps as much as 9 percent of the 10 million new units built between 1950 and 1956 were classified as substandard in 1956, due in part at least to lack of proper maintenance.

The need for housing, of course, is related to the public's desire for new housing and its willingness to spend its money to get the new housing, instead of spending it for other purposes. A family may prefer a second automobile to a recreation room; some may even prefer an automobile to a third bedroom.

In any discussion of housing, we must keep clearly in mind that money has been made available in huge and almost constantly increasing quantities for home mortgages. The following table shows the amounts of mortgages recorded in the last 10 years, and the net increases in mortgages outstanding.

Total nonfarm mortgage recordings of $20,000 or less have grown from $16.2 billion in 1950 to an estimated figure of $32 billion in 1959. The increase in mortgage debt outstanding on 1- to 4-family properties went from $7.6 billion in 1950 to an estimated $13 billion in 1959. And even in 1957, when there was a decline in housing starts and mortgages, there still was a figure of over $24 billion for nonfarm mortgage recordings—$8 billion more than the figure in 1950—and there still was a net increase in mortgage debt outstanding on 1- to 4-family properties of $8.6 billion, $1 billion more than the net increase in 1950.

Throughout the postwar years, net flows of funds into mortgages have represented an extremely large share of the total net flow of funds into capital markets.

Source: "Study of Mortgage Credit," Senate Banking and Currency Committee, 86th Cong., 1st sess., p. 190; 1958 figures and 1959 estimates from Federal Reserve System.

This table compares only the net flow of funds into corporate securities and State, municipal, and Federal obligations with the flow of funds into mortgages. It does not, for example, take into account the flow of funds into consumer credit, which rose from $21 billion in 1950 to almost $50 billion in October 1959.

Those proposing an increase of funds into the mortgage field, over and above the large amount and the large porportion now going into mortgages, should think carefully where it is to come from. Funds going into corporate securities are the source of our long-term growth in productivity. New factories, to produce additional raw materials and manufactured goods, are expensive, and money to finance them must be raised somehow if we are to have increasing production. Funds going into local, State, and Federal securities provide roads, dams, airports, schools, hospitals, and meet the deficits in Federal budgets which so frequently follow the adoption of lavish spending programs. And while funds flowing into consumer credit do not directly increase future productivity, they provide an incentive for manufacturers to increase their plants, and they represent a choice by the consumer in favor of automobiles, television sets, washing machines, and the like, as compared with housing or anything else they could spend their money on.

The increased demands for funds for consumer credit, for mortgages and for corporate and governmental purposes had the result of increasing interest rates. These increases in interest rates were not confined to the mortgage field. Interest rates, and yields in the case of securities whose interest rates are fixed, have risen to the highest point in about 25 years. It would indeed be surprising if interest on mortgages had not followed suit.

The general rise in interest rates hit especially hard FHA and VA mortgages, where the rates were fixed by law. The table showing mortgage recordings and increases in outstanding mortgage debt illustrates this. The amount of conventional mortgages recorded has increased gradually but steadily, the only decline being from $18.6 billion in 1956 to $18.2 billion in 1957. In contrast to this, FHA mortgage recordings rose and fell repeatedly. VA mortgages rose and fell even more violently. The same contrast between conventional mortgages and FHA and VA mortgages is shown in the table giving increases in mortgage debt outstanding.

The Joint Economic Committee's recent staff report on employment, growth, and price levels at page 365 takes the position that the fixed interest rates on FHA and VA mortgages is the cause of the pronounced fluctuations in mortgage funds available for these programs:

> Due to ceilings on the interest rates that may be charged on mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration and guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration, a rise in yields on other competitive types of investments, such as corporate and Government securities, has tended to attract the supply of investment funds away from these mortgages. On the other hand, when credit conditions have eased and yields on competitive investments have fallen, the supply of investment funds has tended to flow back into the Government-supported mortgage programs.

The report takes the position that "a continuing high degree of sensitivity seems likely as long as the ceilings on FHA and VA interest rates remain in effect." An occasional increase in the statutory interest rates for VA and FHA mortgages, invariably too little and too late, does not eliminate the problems caused by the statutory fixed rate.

However, even if the statutory interest rates for VA and FHA mortgages were eliminated, the housing industry would still be so dependent upon credit that changes in the credit situation—changes in the supply of credit and changes in the cost of credit—would necessarily have a substantial effect upon the industry. The housing industry would still have to compete with other uses for money.

One method of helping housing in this competition would be for the Government to subsidize housing directly or indirectly. This means that the taxpayer sooner or later must reduce his expenditures, on things he wants to buy for himself, in order to supply housing to the beneficiaries of the subsidy. This is what is done in the public housing program and what would be done in any program involving direct loans at a lower rate of interest than what the Government must pay to get the money. I have opposed these programs, and I expect to continue to oppose them.

Another method of making money available for housing is to impose selective controls or direct controls on other activities which compete with housing. On paper, it would be easy to reduce consumer credit by direct controls on it so as to make the money now flowing into consumer credit available for housing credit. In 1958 more than $40 billion of installment credit was extended. Only a fraction of this would serve to even out the flow of money into the mortgage field. But I would not favor this. Important as housing is, I would not favor the use of selective credit controls in order to protect housing against fluctuations in the supply of credit.

The most effective way, I think, for the Congress to reduce the ups and downs in housing, aside from the elimination of the statutory interest rates on FHA and VA mortgages, would be to balance the Federal budget. An unbalanced Federal budget means that the Treasury must go into the capital market and borrow billions of dollars, in competition with other users of money. The $12 billion deficit of the fiscal year 1959 imposed on capital markets a drain which could not help but push interest rates up substantially.

If the Congress will eliminate the inflationary drain on capital markets of an unbalanced Federal budget, I am convinced that the housing industry can compete on equal terms with other users of credit. There still will be occasions when it will be necessary to tighten up on credit generally, in the interest of a sound and stable economy; and there still will be occasions when it will be necessary to relax credit, in the interest of a sound and stable economy. As a user of credit, the housing industry should be subject to the general policies applicable to the use of credit.

In closing, I want to make it clear, as I did at the beginning, that these comments on the subject of housing are general. No housing legislation is before us at the moment. When such proposed legislation is introduced and is under consideration, it will, of course, be necessary to have each proposal made considered on its merits and in the light of the general economic background.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am pleased to yield to the chairman of the Housing Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee on his presentation, which contained a great deal of helpful information. I thank him and commend him for it.

In this connection, let me say that the Senator from Virginia, as chairman of the full Banking and Currency Committee, has always been most helpful in connection with the enactment of good, strong, dependable housing legislation. I thank him for his outstandingly fine work.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alabama very sincerely for his kind words.

I yield the floor.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY CONTROL PROBLEMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be read by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 694) to provide Federal assistance for projects which will demonstrate or develop techniques and practices leading to a solution of the Nation's juvenile delinquency control problems.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 571, Senate bill 2436.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title, for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5421) to provide a program of assistance to correct inequities in the construction of fishing vessels and to enable the fishing industry of the United States to regain a favorable economic status, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. BONNER, Mr. BOYKIN, Mr. GEORGE MILLER of California, Mr. TOLLEFSON, and Mr. VAN PELT were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

THE STEEL STRIKE SETTLEMENT

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, the settlement of the steel strike was the answer to the prayers of millions of Americans—not only steelworkers and their families, but the entire population. It was generally admitted that the steel strike was a threat to our entire economy. At its peak, over 1,200,000 workers were out of jobs. Many industries and the workers in nearly all industries were threatened. For weeks, there was an impasse. Then, light came through the clouds. A settlement was reached. Millions of Americans took a sigh of relief, and felt gratitude in their hearts.

The Vice President of the United States was given credit for playing a principal role in the settlement; and, at first, no one seemed to begrudge him this honor.

Then, when the first flush of victory passed, politics raised its ugly head. Members of one party said: "Hey, wait a minute. Our opponent in the next presidential campaign is getting too much credit. We have been stymied by President Eisenhower's popularity; we have not been able to attack him. And now comes his successor, getting general acclaim. How can we head that off, in this election year? Why, in only one way: by saying that the settlement was not such a great one, after all. We can say that the settlement was unfair to the steel companies, even though they are satisfied. We can say the settlement is inflationary, even though it is not."

But the opposition got its wires crossed. Before word was passed along to criticize the settlement, instead of praising it, one member of the opposition proclaimed that the father of one of their candidates deserved credit for the settlement.

Political opponents of Vice President NIXON say that the steel strike settlement is inflationary. Let us look at that statement. Under the settlement, the average earnings per year will rise less than 3¾ percent. Compare this with the 3.82 percent increase under the separate Kaiser Steel Co. settlement, 4.5 percent for the can industry, and 5.2 percent for the aluminum industry. These other increases average nearly 30 percent more than the steel settlement increase. Mr. Roger Blough, chairman of the board of United States Steel, has verified the fact that the average annual increase in hourly employment costs resulting from the steel strike settlement will be 3.5 to 3.75 percent. This is in contrast to the increases under other steel settlements during the postwar period, during which hourly employment costs have been rising at an average of 8 percent a year. Thus, by means of the steel strike settlement, the postwar trend has been cut in half. The steel wage increase of 7 cents which goes into effect December 1960, is less than the average increase. As a matter of fact, 65 percent of the wage increases in 1959 exceed that figure.

What this means is that the steel strike settlement is in line with—or, I should say, below the line of—others negotiated. It cannot be any excuse for setting off an inflationary wage pattern.

Newspaper reports of the settlement were misleading. There was no 40-cents-per-hour wage increase. That is an exaggerated gross figure related to total overall costs. A table which I shall insert in the RECORD shows the breakdown of the overall figure. The 40-cent figure would represent more than a 10-percent increase, while, as a matter of fact, the average increase under the settlement is less than 3.75 percent per year—much less than the average increase covering all industry.

One of the main issues in the steel strike settlement had to do with the work rules aspect. The settlement set up a union-management committee, to be headed by an impartial third party representing the public, to set work rules. Steel company executives tell us that this is what they wanted and what they insisted upon, that it is a victory for management, and that it will, without doubt, improve work rules, to the end that there will be more efficiency and more productivity. Labor and management thus combine to increase the pace of productivity gains.

The figures I have used in this statement are taken from statements by R. Conrad Cooper, chairman of the steel companies coordinating committee, and Roger Blough, chairman of the board of U.S. Steel, one of the companies for which "the bleeding hearts" are bleeding.

I would like to ask those who have criticized the steel settlement: Would you have preferred no settlement? What kind of settlement did you propose? Or, if you did not propose anything, what kind of settlement would you have proposed?

Mr. President, I feel rather sorry for the opposition. For a long time they have been overawed by President Eisenhower's tremendous popularity; and now they have had a taste of Vice President NIXON's outstanding ability and the public recognition of that ability. I suppose we can expect more of the sort of unjust criticism and distraction which we have witnessed the past few days, but I do not believe that the people will be so easily fooled. They know that there was a steel strike; and they know that it was settled in a manner satisfactory to the parties concerned, including the public; and they know that Secretary of Labor Mitchell and Vice President NIXON played leading roles in the popular settlement.

My thanks and the thanks of millions of other Americans go to Secretary of Labor Mitchell and to the President of the Senate, Vice President NIXON, for their part in the steel strike settlement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, two tables which show the steel strike settlement terms, as compared with the terms of other settlements. The tables were prepared for me by the Department of Labor.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE GOV. CLINTON A. CLAUSON, OF MAINE

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I am moved to share with the Senate the profound sorrow and the deep sense of loss with which all Maine citizens reacted to the untimely death of Gov. Clinton A. Clauson in the early morning hours of December 30, 1959.

The dimensions of our loss are spelled out, not simply in political terms, nor in terms of the abruptness with which his dedicated service to Maine was terminated—great as it was by these standards—but, more broadly and meaningfully, by the warm, human qualities which esablished a close, personal relationship beween him and the people he served so well.

"Doc," as he was known to all of us, was a kindly man. He was a genial man. He was a sympathetic, understanding, and compassionate man. The problems of others, whatever their station in life, were his problems. He gave unstintingly of his time, his energies, his attention, and his heart to those who sought his counsel and assistance. He was available to all. He denied himself to none.

It was these qualities which prompted one of our Maine newspapers to say editorially, with a voice which spoke for all of us, "losing him hurts a great deal."

In the memorial service to Governor Clauson, the Reverend Kenneth Lloyd Garrison spoke in these words movingly and eloquently of this man who was so beloved of his people:

> Clinton Clauson was a man of the soil who never did and never wanted to shake from his soul the color of the farm that gave him birth. Yet he combined with this rural warmth, an urban sagacity.

It was not in his nature to pretend to be anything but what he was. He was above corruption. He could look any man in the face without seeing a ballot box in one eye and a dollar sign in the other. This made people trust him. This made the rank and file of the citizens of Maine want him to be their chief executive. He was honest.

He was a public servant who could never separate his vocation from his avocation. Blessed is the man who is able to say that his work is his fun. He shook hands with people the first time because it was his job; the second time because it was his wish yet he loved them on both occasions. No journey was too far, no group too small, no occasion too insignificant—but that he went to share his convictions of good government. He was dedicated to his work.

Clinton Clauson never thought too highly of himself. His companions knew both more and less than he. From the former he learned; with the latter he never felt superior. He walked the tight rope of constant self-analysis. He was a humble man.

Of his friendliness one need not speak. It was once said of this public servant: "Show me a man who dislikes Doc and I will show you a man who hates himself."

He had so little chance, so governed was he by circumstances and time, to write his name boldly upon the business records of the State, yet, of where he stood, and what he wished to do there seems to have been no doubt. Men differed with him but they were his friends. He battled issues, yet in all his fellow men he saw the spark of God that made him love them.

The Governor was born on a farm in Mitchell, Iowa, 64 years ago. After receiving chiropractic training in his home State, he moved to the State of Maine while still a young man, settling in the city of Waterville. In his new city, he found the lovely bride, Ellen Kelleher, who was to be his partner in a lifetime of public service. Their family life was both devoted and tightly knit as their son and daughter grew up and, in later years, as grandchildren joined the affectionate family circle.

Governor Clauson was interested in Democratic politics, at first as a hobby, ever since he was old enough to cast his first presidential ballot for Woodrow Wilson. After military service in the First World War, he returned to Waterville and developed a lifelong, serious interest in the activities of his political party. He served at all levels of party organization, first as ward chairman, then as chairman of his party's city committee, and from 1928 to 1932 as a member of the Democratic State committee at a time when his party was victorious at the State level. He resigned from active participation in politics when he was appointed collector of internal revenue for the State of Maine in 1933. He served conscientiously and ably in that capacity until 1952, earning statewide approval of the quality of his work.

Once again Dr. Clauson had an opportunity to serve the people of his community through the avenues of active political participation. He served as mayor of Waterville, Maine, in 1956 and 1957, and was elected Governor of Maine in 1958, the first Governor in the history of Maine elected to a 4-year term, and the first Democrat to be elected following another Democrat in more than a hundred years.

His qualities as a man were reflected in Governor Clauson's approach to his duties as chief executive of Maine.

He believed he should know his people and that they should know him—intimately and personally. He believed that only in this way could government be responsive to their needs, and so he moved among them constantly, meeting them, talking to them, listening to their views. And they responded to him, and trusted him, and believed him when he said that his one objective was to contribute to the building of a State which would serve their needs better.

There is no doubt that he was dedicated to that task. His work, his programs, his words, and his actions were pointed to it.

It is a tragedy that he was cut down at the threshold of greater accomplishments in the interests of his beloved adopted State, and that the people of Maine were thus deprived of the full measure of that service which he gave so unstintingly and well.

His loss is deeply mourned by all citizens of Maine, regardless of party. His humility, his human warmth, his love of life, family, and fellow man, his years of devoted public service, have left a lasting imprint on the State of Maine.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a resolution adopted by the Maine congressional delegation.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION BY THE MAINE CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION ON THE LATE GOV. CLINTON A. CLAUSON

Whereas the State of Maine has been saddened by the death of its Governor, the late Clinton A. Clauson; and

Whereas the members of the Maine congressional delegation held the highest respect and affection for Governor Clauson, both as an individual and as a dedicated public servant; and

Whereas the members of the Maine delegation have the deepest sympathy for the bereaved family of Governor Clauson: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Maine congressional delegation hereby note its profound sorrow over the passing of Clinton A. Clauson; and that copies of this resolution be sent, with the delegation's deepest sympathy, to the widow and family of the late Governor.

MARGARET CHASE SMITH,
U.S. Senator.
EDMUND S. MUSKIE,
U.S. Senator.
CLIFFORD G. MCINTIRE,
Member of Congress.
FRANK M. COFFIN,
Member of Congress.
JAMES C. OLIVER,
Member of Congress.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I feel inadequate in undertaking to describe for my colleagues who did not have the privilege of knowing Governor Clauson the qualities of this man, and so I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD various items which will speak more eloquently than I can: The full text of the memorial service by the Reverend Kenneth Lloyd Garrison; the text of the funeral prayer by the Reverend John I. Daniel, of Waterville, Maine; and various editorials and newspaper comments upon the passing of this devoted servant and adopted son of my great State.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR THE HONORABLE CLINTON A. CLAUSON, GOVERNOR OF MAINE, JANUARY 2, 1960

(By Rev. Kenneth Lloyd Garrison)

On the Ides of March in 44 B.C. an assassin cut short the life of Julius Caesar, the ruler of Rome. William Shakespeare, in romanticizing it in his play, puts the following funeral oration upon the lips of Mark Antony.

"Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears;
I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him.
The evil that men do lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones;
So let it be with Caesar. The noble Brutus
Hath told you Caesar was ambitious;
If it were so, it was a grievous fault,
And grievously hath Caesar answered it.
Here, under leave of Brutus and the rest—
For Brutus is an honorable man;
So are they all, all honorable men—
Come I to speak in Caesar's funeral.
He was my friend, faithful and just to me:
But Brutus says he was ambitious;
And Brutus is an honorable man.
He hath brought many captives home to Rome
Whose ransoms did the general coffers fill:
Did this in Caesar seem ambitious?
When that the poor have cried, Caesar hath wept:
Ambition should be made of sterner stuff:
Yet Brutus says he was ambitious;
And Brutus is an honorable man.
You all did see that on the Lupercal
I thrice presented him a kingly crown,
Which he did thrice refuse: was this ambition?
Yet Brutus says he was ambitious;
And, sure, he is an honorable man.
I speak not to disprove what Brutus spoke,
But here I am to speak what I do know.
You all did love him once, not without cause;
What cause withholds you then, to mourn for him?
O judgment! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason. Bear with me;
My heart is in the coffin there with Caesar,
And I must pause till it come back to me."

On the 30th day of December 1959, another assassin cut short the life of Clinton Amos Clauson, the Governor of Maine. Now we have come to bury him because we must. But we have come to praise him because we wish.

The task is fraught with high emotion because he was our friend and we did love him, and our hearts are in the coffin with him. It would be best to await another day to set a value upon such a man; a day when reason returns and tributes carry not the scent of flowers.

Yet here he lies within our midst and honor, duty, and desire command our tethered minds. How flimsy a vehicle of true expression is a funeral eulogy. If a man is evil, in such an hour, we would not take advantage of the sorrow of his loved ones to cast aspersions on his name. But if a man is good, as this man was, how powerless we are to add one cubit to his stature.

What, therefore, we say today is not to be construed alone as praise of this, our friend, the servant of the State, but rather it is to call to our remembrance those attributes—which, though a man may differ strongly with others by conviction—will make them sadder and poorer when like the proverbial Arab he folds his earthly tent and steals away into the night of eternity.

It is not required that a public servant be the most politically astute of men—but it is required that he be honest.

It is not necessary that he possess the wisdom of Solomon—but it is to be expected that he will be dedicated to his task.

It is not essential that he be puffed up with tinted arrogance—but it is beneficial to the State if he is humble.

It is not dictated that he give a glad hand to every potential voter—but it is wholesome if he is warm and friendly.

Clinton Clauson was a man of the soil who never did and never wanted to shake from his soul the color of the farm that gave him birth. Yet he combined with this rural warmth an urban sagacity.

It was not in his nature to pretend to be anything but what he was. He was above corruption. He could look any man in the face without seeing a ballot box in one eye and a dollar sign in the other. This made people trust him. This made the rank and file of the citizens of Maine want him to be their chief executive. He was honest.

He was a public servant who could never separate his vocation from his avocation. Blessed is the man who is able to say that his work is his fun. He shook hands with people the first time because it was his job; the second time because it was his wish, yet he loved them on both occasions. No journey was too far, no group too small, no occasion too insignificant—but that he went to share his convictions of good government. He was dedicated to his work.

Clinton Clauson never thought too highly of himself. His companions knew both more and less than he. From the former he learned; with the latter he never felt superior. He walked the tight rope of constant self-analysis. He was a humble man.

Of his friendliness one need not speak. It was once said of this public servant: "Show me a man who dislikes Doc and I will show you a man who hates himself."

The reflections of posterity will more properly evaluate the contributions made by this kindly man. We attest that, virtuously speaking, he was a good Governor.

History will assign him the place that he merits among the leaders of men.

There was so much that he wanted to do. So much left undone. A homely American poet has summed it up well:

"Oh, never we reach to our fullest height,
And never we do our all;
We must turn away at the close of day
When the tools from our fingers fall.
But it isn't a failure to hold a dream
That never on earth comes true,
For the tasks of worth that we miss on earth
Are reserved for our souls to do."

He had so little chance, so governed was he by circumstances and time, to write his name boldly upon the business records of the State, yet, of where he stood, and what he wished to do there seems to have been no doubt. Men differed with him but they were his friends. He battled issues, yet in all his fellow men he saw the spark of God that made him love them.

I know of no more fitting final testimony to this first citizen of Maine than those words supplied by Frederick J. Gillman shortly after the Civil War:

"God send us men whose aim 'twill be,
Not to defend some ancient creed,
But to live out the laws of Christ
In every thought and word and deed.
God send us men with hearts ablaze
All truth to love, all wrong to hate;
These are the patriots nations need,
These are the bulwarks of the State."

(Selections read from Holy Scripture: Psalm 1: 27, 121; Romans 8: 13–39; Matthew 25: 34–40; Psalm 23.)

Clauson Funeral Prayer Text

The following is the text of the prayer prepared by the Reverend John I. Daniel, of Waterville, for delivery at Gov. Clinton A. Clauson's funeral this afternoon:

"Father in Heaven, we thank You for the privilege of having known in this life, Clinton A. Clauson. Some of us have known him many years, as a private citizen; others only more recently amid his responsibilities as mayor of Waterville, or as Governor of our great State; but all of us who have experienced his warmth and friendliness, have felt a spark of the Divine shining from his human eyes.

"Once more, O Lord, we raise the cry of 'Why?'—Why must there be heartache and frustration, sickness, anguish, separation—death? And while our eyes cannot penetrate the cloud of mystery, or our ears detect an auditory answer, we thank You for the knowledge that You sent Your son into our world to suffer with us; accepting all that man knows of heartache, anguish, misunderstanding, violence, death.

"We thank You for his words, 'Because I live, you shall live also;' and for the wonder of divine forgiveness expressed in Christ's promise to the criminal crucified beside Him on the cross, 'Today shalt thou with Me be in paradise.' Grant us that honest penitence for our sins, O God, we pray, whereby we too may lay hold upon our Master's promise of forgiveness.

"We thank You that love is that which is common to this world and eternity. Grant that we may surrender our fears, anxieties, resentments—every negative thought which blocks the flow of love through the channels of our hearts. O God, may we become more sensitive to others. May we become more understandingly aware of those whom we encounter on life's journey, even as Governor Clauson was so humbly aware. Grant us the largeness of heart and sufficient holy imagination to realize that probably everyone does the best he can under the circumstances, if only we can be understanding enough to realize his circumstances.

"Bless, we beseech Thee, the loved ones of Governor Clauson. Bless his wife, his children, grandchildren, and his many grieving friends.

"Grant that all of us may keep the candles of memory lighted on the altars of our hearts for those dear ones whose voices are now silent. Forbid that we should think of them as merely resting—but rather that they have been called from out our midst to greater responsibilities, more dynamic and creative labors than while they were with us; purged of their infirmities, and working amid the vital presence of Jesus.

"Even as our faith makes known to us that love is immortal, O God, so would we be mindful that death is only a horizon, the limit of our sight. Lift us, that we may see farther, illuminate our eyes that we may see more clearly. Draw us closer to Thyself, that we may know ourselves nearer to our beloved who are with Thee.

"And now in these years, or months, or days which remain to us, may we lay hold upon that love which is eternal. Grant, O God, that when a voice speaks to us, as it has so recently spoken to Clinton Clauson, it may say to us, as to him: 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter, thou, into the joy of thy Lord. Amen.'"

Clauson Tributes Pour in From State, Nation

Tributes to Governor Clauson's warmth, kindliness, and devotion to public service keynoted the comments on his unexpected death Wednesday.

Senator John F. Kennedy, of Massachusetts, a 1960 Democratic presidential nomination hopeful, spoke of Clauson's ability and human qualities and deplored the loss of his wise counsel.

The Democrats' national chairman, Paul Butler, said the news "is a source of great sorrow to Democrats everywhere."

Republican National Committee member Bradford H. Hutchins, of Waterville, said Clauson was "a friend of everybody who knew him."

The man whom Clauson defeated for the governorship—ex-Governor Horace Hildreth, Republican—said he was "an exceedingly kindly man" whose untimely death is "a tragic event which saddens all the citizenry of Maine."

Clauson's predecessor in Blaine House—Senator Edmund S. Muskie, Democrat—said it was tragic Clauson couldn't give the people "a full measure of the service he gave so unstintingly and so well."

Excerpts from other comment:

State Senate President John H. Reed, now the Governor: "I considered him a true friend and join with thousands of others who mourn his passing."

Maynard C. Dolloff, who lost to Clauson in the 1958 Democratic primary: "Maine has lost a tremendously dedicated and sincere citizen."

Ex-Gov. Percival P. Baxter, Republican: "Governor Clauson was a fine, honest, able Governor."

Congressman Frank M. Coffin, Democrat: "His 1 year as Governor was distinguished by two words which to him were always a keynote—responsible progress."

Connecticut's Gov. Abraham Ribicoff, Democrat: "A grievous loss. I found him to be a warm individual and a man of great integrity."

Mayor Albert Bernier, Democrat, of Waterville: "I feel that he represented more thoroughly than possibly any Governor all the people of all walks of life."

Frederick N. Allen, of Portland, chairman of the public utilities commission: "I have known the Governor for many years and have always found him willing and eager to lend his hand in any way in which he was needed. During the past year he has shown a real interest in the working of all governmental departments * * * always striving to keep abreast of any problem and offering constructive advice and full cooperation."

Said Gov. and Mrs. Wesley Powell of New Hampshire: "Mrs. Powell and I express to you our heartfelt personal sympathy in the passing of your good husband and fine public servant. I extend also, the sympathy of the people of New Hampshire to you personally and through you to the people of Maine."

Vermont Gov. Robert T. Stafford said he was "deeply shocked to learn of the sudden passing of Gov. Clinton Clauson, of Maine."

Stafford said, "In the past year, Governor Clauson has worked closely with the other New England Governors to promote the social and economic growth of the region."

He said Vermont Personnel Director Frederick Downing, former director of the Maine State Employees Association, will represent him at the funeral of Clauson.

Gov. Foster Furcolo, Democrat, of Massachusetts, said that the death of Gov. Clinton Clauson, Democrat, of Maine, "will be felt severely by his friends everywhere.

"He was one of the most friendly, capable, and dedicated men I have ever known and a credit in every respect to his great State and to his country.

"Mrs. Furcolo joins me in extending our sympathy to his family," Furcolo added.

Richard J. Dubord, of Waterville, Democratic national committeeman: "His brief year in office gained him many new friends and prophesied a brilliant career. Our State has lost a beloved leader."

Mrs. Ellen Thomas, of Anson, vice chairman of the Republican State Committee: "Governor Clauson's death brings sadness to all the people of Maine regardless of partisan belief. He was a kindly man with the interest of his State foremost in his heart."

Governor Clauson—He Was a Most Happy Fellow

(By Peter M. Damborg)

"He was a most happy fellow."

Those are the words of Gov. Clinton A. Clauson's administrative assistant, Maurice Williams, describing how the late chief executive appeared as he ended his statehouse day Tuesday—8 hours before his unexpected death in the Blaine House.

Perhaps Williams' description best summarizes the spirit, the contagious affability of the man who came to head his State, despite the predictions of all but the most devoted of his many friends.

It certainly fits the personality of a Governor who, possibly more than any other man in modern times, appeared to be beloved by all who met and knew him—perhaps by all the people of Maine.

He was not a great politician. He personally knew and acknowledged that he was not a dynamic leader. He was far from being a spellbinding orator. And he had a lot to learn about State government.

But "Doc" Clauson—the nickname he liked best—knew people. And the people liked his way of getting across to them that he recognized his limitations. It has been said that it's doubtful that he made a single enemy while Governor.

"Doc" Clauson thought about running for Governor in 1954, the year that Edmund S. Muskie—another Waterville political success—threw his lot against Gov. Burton M. Cross (Republican of Augusta) and won.

I interviewed him early that year and his attitude was something like this:

"I'd like to be Governor, I think any man would who feels he could contribute something and who loves his State as you and I do.

"But I like to think I am a practical man and I just don't think this is the year for it. My party has little organization strength. The odds would be pretty heavy—and besides, Mrs. Clauson isn't too well right now and my son (Neil) and I are getting a good start in the oil business.

"I won't give up the idea, though, and you can be sure I'll let you know whenever I make up my mind to run, if I do."

Four years later, "Doc" Clauson called to remind this writer of his promise "to let you know."

His philosophy then—less than 2 years ago—was in this vein:

"I think the time is right now, I guess I should have run before, but I didn't and we've had a wonderful Governor since and the party has grown tremendously.

"I don't know whether or not I can make it, but I'm going to try. There's no harm in that. If I lose, I'll make a lot of new friends and have fun seeing old ones along the way."

This same "I hope I can, but I won't be mad if I don't" Clauson spirit prevailed through the 1958 campaign. It was a rough one—two, in fact, because he had to defeat a well known State grange master, Maynard C. Dolloff who had the public blessings of a big majority of the "new" Democrats.

Time after time, he would call me aside, after a campaign speech, and ask: "How am I doing?" And when the answer was "pretty good but why not try speaking off-the-cuff? You're better at that than reading a script," he would smile and reply: "I'm not a public speaker. All I'm trying to do is get my message across and meet the people and hope I'm accepted."

That he was accepted now is a matter of record. He defeated former Governor, ex-U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan Horace A. Hildreth, by 10,000 votes.

He enjoyed those campaign days which often began at 6 a.m.—like the mornings he met with the Lewiston Public Works Department employees, going to work.

Following U.S. Senate Candidate Muskie through industrial plants, he looked as though he was trying to tie onto the lanky Governor's coattails. But as the drive for votes for the two came close to an end, it was apparent that "Doc" was keeping up with Muskie, that folks were sensing his down-to-earth, almost nonpolitical approach.

Sunday night, the eve of the September election, "Doc" and Mrs. Clauson dropped in to the Portland Press Herald office, along with the Muskies and the Olivers and the Coffins. They had finished their last television appearance. Mostly, the office crew look to Muskie. But, Clauson too "did the handshake rounds."

Mrs. Clauson came over to my desk. She smiled, and said: "Well, it's all over now. I'm glad because you know, I think Doc is awfully tired. He doesn't believe it, though. What do you think will happen tomorrow or don't you think you should say?"

The reply was as soft as possible: "I honestly don't think it looks too good but you shouldn't give up hope." She smiled, sweetly, and answered: "I don't think so, either, but that's all right. It's been fun and he's really enjoyed it."

When it was all over, both Clausons wore the same smile they showed the night before the election that appeared so doubtful. And it was these smiles that continued to earn them more and more friends.

Clauson went into office knowing he had a lot to learn—but happy. He learned, he surrounded himself with top men in their fields.

But—he appeared continually to disprove his wife's contention that he tired from constant activity. He accepted almost all invitations to speak, to appear at both public and private functions. And before his first legislative session was over, he was talking about stumping the State again.

"I want to show my friends who supported me that I meant it when I said I was coming back," he told me in private one day. "I'd like to revisit every plant and shop that I covered during the campaign.

"And, besides," he chuckled, "it would be good politics, now wouldn't it?"

He did go back over some of the same ground of the 1958 campaign but his State duties prevented complete coverage, coupled with his combined business-social calendar.

A youngster met the Governor not too long ago and said, with child-like simplicity: "You don't look like a Governor; you look like a grandfather."

A State house janitor yesterday paused and said: "It is a shock. He was a fine gentleman."

"Doc," "Clint," Governor Clauson—a grandfatherly gentleman who earned the love of the people of his State because he was honest, humble, friendly, and their kind of man.

GOVERNOR CLAUSON'S UNTIMELY DEATH

The death of Gov. Clinton A. Clauson this morning came as a great shock to the people of Maine. The Governor seemingly enjoyed the best of health and only last night was a guest of honor in Lewiston at a dinner given by Paragon Glass Co. to express its thanks to those who helped in the firm's relocation in Maine.

Words always are and always will be inadequate when it comes to expressing sympathy. All we can do is to extend sincere expressions of regret, knowing full well that similar sentiments pouring in from all over Maine in no way will ease the sense of loss felt by the late Governor's family.

Clint Clauson, as he was known to his friends, attained the governorship against considerable odds. He was not expected to win the Democratic Party nomination in the primary election, and there was much doubt over his ability to defeat former Republican Governor Horace Hildreth.

The Clauson personality had much to do with his political achievements. The Governor had a warm, kindly personality that won him a host of friends. He was a man virtually everyone "took to." Political opponents and opposition party members found it impossible to dislike him, even when in disagreement with him.

Governor Clauson did not live to complete a full year of his 4-year term of office. During his first year he had the satisfaction of seeing the Republican-controlled legislature enact a budget closely corresponding to the one advocated by him for the biennium. This same period found him doing a workmanlike job as chief of state.

Once again we wish to extend our deepest sympathy to Governor Clauson's family.

[From the Portland (Maine) Evening Express, Dec. 30, 1959]

GOV. CLINTON A. CLAUSON

Death early this morning robbed Gov. Clinton A. Clauson of the chance to display as the State's chief executive the outstanding administrative ability which had marked his performance in every public office he has held.

Governor Clauson had nearly completed the first year of the first 4-year term in Maine history. It was a year of study, for he had to overcome the handicap of no legislative experience. It was a year of getting his feet placed in the giant footprints of his predecessor, U.S. Senator EDMUND S. MUSKIE, certainly the greatest Democratic votegetter in Maine history and one of the State's most popular Governors.

It was a year marked by inevitable differences with the executive council, and by the longest legislative session in the State's history, and by unusual budget difficulties.

It was a year, too, in which he emerged from the shadows of those who had been politically more prominent to gain full partnership with the State's other Democratic leaders, Senator MUSKIE and U.S. Representatives FRANK M. COFFIN and JAMES C. OLIVER.

Governor Clauson considered politics only a hobby when he first became interested more than 40 years ago in Waterville. Twelve years later he sold his chiropractic practice to enter public service and he never returned to his profession. He was Maine collector of internal revenue for 19 years and was mayor of Waterville the 2 years prior to his election as Governor.

Governor Clauson was widely known as a man who had the courage of his convictions and those who have watched executive councils assume what seemed to be many of the Governor's powers, particularly in the appointive area, were willing to wager that he would have tamed the council within the 4 years. If he hadn't succeeded, council personnel at least would have known they'd been involved in a battle to the bitter end, said those close to the Governor.

For Governor Clauson was a humble man, as all his friends will attest, but he was determined and independent and he had a fierce pride in his office and in its prerogatives. He had a serene confidence, too, and this never was displayed to better advantage than in his decision to become a gubernatorial candidate in defiance of the wishes of the State's new Democrats, who wanted a younger man.

It is a matter of record now, of course, that Governor Clauson defeated their candidate in a hotly-contested primary election; and then went on to become Governor in an amazing Democratic landslide in the State elections. Then he set about healing the party wounds, for with Muskie and Oliver and Coffin in Washington, it was apparent that the welfare of the Maine Democratic Party would be Governor Clauson's responsibility.

This task of reunifying the party wasn't too difficult for Governor Clauson, who cast his first vote for President Wilson in 1916 and had been active in Maine Democratic councils ever since. His reputation for sincerity and integrity never was questioned. He was remembered, too, as one of those who helped to fashion the surprising Democratic victories of the early 1930's, when Louis J. Brann became Governor. And so this long and uninterrupted service to his party, which provided a link between the old Democrats of Brann and Harold Dubord, and the current new Democrats, added weight and dignity to his peacemaking efforts.

Governor Clauson never indulged in personalities in any political contest. His advisers time after time urged him to take off the gloves in his recent gubernatorial campaign against his Republican opponent, but he adamantly refused. Even in the heat of the primary battle, when he was the target for some bitter criticisms, he stuck to issues and problems.

He refused 5 years ago to run for major political office for a reason any father can understand. His son, Cornelius K., in 1954 had purchased an oil distribution business in Waterville and the Governor decided to pass up the political invitations to help his son get started in the business. Two years later, with young Clauson well established, Governor Clauson was his party's champion in the Waterville mayoralty race. He won easily.

Governor Clauson's loyalty to the national Democratic Party remained unshaken though he was an innocent victim of the reorganization of the Internal Revenue Service. Nineteen years of faithful service went by the board, though it might have been expected that he would remain in the position until retirement, when directors were chosen by civil service examinations and he was replaced by a career man. These changes were made during the Truman administration and so it was Governor Clauson's searing experience to be jettisoned by his own party.

The reorganization appeared to be a necessity in the national interest, the Governor told friends who didn't hesitate to voice their bitterness. His loyalty never wavered.

The State lost a competent and dedicated servant when death so suddenly took Governor Clauson, and his party lost a great leader.

[From the Augusta (Maine) Kennebec Journal, Dec. 31, 1959]

CLINTON A. CLAUSON

The State of Maine has lost a good Governor, the capital city has lost a good friend and neighbor, in the sudden passing of the Honorable Clinton A. Clauson.

He was really one of us, a man who entered wholeheartedly into the life of the community. During his years of service as chief of the Internal Revenue Service here he had been closely associated with Augusta people. He was a former president of the Augusta Rotary Club. Augusta knew him in those years and during his more than 11 months of residence in the Blaine House, as a good neighbor—as one of the best.

He liked people—liked them so genuinely, so sincerely, that people could not help liking him. And their politics had nothing to do with it.

Governor Clauson did his level best to be a good Governor of this State—and he succeeded in that determination. The conservatism with which he approached problems of State finance and government at first surprised and soon delighted those who, being in the opposing political camp, had looked with foreboding on the accession of another Democratic chief executive.

Taxpayers found themselves applauding the firm restraint Governor Clauson brought to State fiscal planning. His budget message to the legislature last January demonstrated a realistic awareness of Maine's economic needs—and of the ability of Maine taxpayers to meet those needs. And that message won applause from one end of the State to the other, from Republicans and Democrats alike. People who, until then, had not been well acquainted with this man, breathed sighs of relief. The State, it appeared, was in capable hands.

And so it was. Governor Clauson was enthusiastic about his position as chief executive. He liked people and wanted to help them. He loved this old State, and he served it to the best of his ability. An intensely loyal party man, he nevertheless put State above party, when it came to that. No words are adequate to express the statewide sense of loss and of grief at his passing.

[From the Portland (Maine) Thursday Morning, Dec. 31, 1959]

FOR GOVERNOR CLAUSON

As a man Clinton A. Clauson possessed humility, dignity, humanity, integrity, and morality. To the governorship of Maine he brought all these traits of character and, what is truly the measure of this dedicated public servant, kept them whole. It would not have occurred to him to do anything else.

Candor compels recording that Dr. Clauson fought for the office of Governor as an underdog. He won. Once elected many of the troubles of the underdog beset him still. Yet, endowed as he was with high character and a deep concern for Maine that sprang from simple affection, he set about governing with the best there was in him. When he died he had grown familiar with a milieu that had at first been strange to him. In short he was repeating the history of his election. He was winning again.

It was always pleasant to meet Governor Clauson—and always easy, for he had no love of remoteness. Maine people knew it because he went among them as often as he could. Newsmen knew it particularly well because their work put them in frequent contact with him and the experience was consistently gracious. People in government and politics knew it too, and more than once their personal fondness for him was enhanced, if anything, by their official opposition.

Politically Maine has lost a Governor whose administration was still evolving and therefore could not yet be judged for the final record although the evolution was distinctly upward. But there is no doubt whatever concerning Clinton A. Clauson the man.

Losing him hurts a great deal.

[From the Portland (Maine) Sunday Telegram, Jan. 3, 1960]

CLINTON A. CLAUSON—A GENTLEMAN

"Isn't he a nice man?" This was the reaction of so many persons on meeting Clinton A. Clauson.

"A most happy fella." His closest associates borrowed this phrase with which to describe him.

"You don't look like a governor. You look like a grandfather." This was the opinion of a 5-year-old who, like all small children, knew perfectly well that all grandfathers are nice men.

To those who knew him briefly as "Governor," and those who knew him for many years as Doc, Clinton Clauson was a kind, warm, friendly man—a gentleman. But the genial Governor was not one to let his desire to like and to be liked override his judgment. He would stand firm for a cause he believed to be just.

It was not given to Clinton Clauson to serve his State long as chief executive. Indeed, so few were the days of his stewardship that his mark as Governor is not clearly defined. But standing plain for all to see is the mark of a man. A nice man. One does well to live out his allotted span and leave behind so many to share in such a eulogy.

Mrs. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleague in the tribute to the late Clinton A. Clauson, who served as Governor of the State of Maine. He was a personal friend of mine for nearly 20 years.

At this point, I read for the RECORD my telegram to Mrs. Clauson and my statement to the newspapers about his untimely passing:

Mrs. CLINTON A. CLAUSON,
Blaine House,
Augusta, Maine:

My heartfelt sympathies to you and the members of your family on the untimely passing of a great American and one of Maine's most beloved citizens. Your grief is shared by all people of Maine. I am grateful for the 20 years of friendship we had.

MARGARET CHASE SMITH.

Following is my statement to the press at the time of the Governor's death:

The death of Governor Clauson is a great loss to the people of Maine. It is a personal loss to me because we have been good friends for 20 years.

In his one year as Governor he not only demonstrated ability and fairness, but he truly became a chief executive beloved by the people of Maine.

I extend my heartfelt sympathies to our gracious first lady of Maine, Mrs. Clauson, and the members of the family.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I rise to pay my respects to a good man and a good Governor, who has passed on in the service of his people.

Gov. Clinton A. Clauson of Maine loved people, and was loved in turn. He made friends throughout the State because he was willing to listen to their problems, and because he was willing to walk an extra mile to help them find a solution. The men and women Clinton Clauson had befriended responded in 1958 by electing him Governor, to succeed the distinguished junior Senator from Maine, Mr. MUSKIE. And now death has cut short his career of public service.

I know that I express the sentiment of all my colleagues when I extend to his family and to the people of Maine my most sincere condolences.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I join the people of Maine in mourning the loss of an outstanding public servant and a great gentleman. The recent death of Gov. Clint Clauson ended a career of able service to the people of his State. Those who knew him as Governor will miss the vision and the integrity which he brought to his work. Those of us who knew him as a friend will miss his warmth and kindness.

I was with Clint Clauson for the first time last Spring during a trip to his State. It did not take long to see why he was such a leader, and why he was so highly respected by his colleagues of both parties. Mrs. Symington and I could never forget the gracious hospitality extended to us by the Governor and his wife.

It was an honor to know Governor Clauson and to be among his friends, and it is with deep sadness and a sense of loss that my wife and I join in paying tribute to Governor Clauson, and in expressing our deepest sympathy to his wife and family.

INCREASE IN RATES BY ALASKA RAILROAD

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, it is not my desire to come before the Senate every other day to call attention to actions by administration officials and agencies affecting my State which run directly counter to policies proclaimed by the President of the United States. Unhappily, I feel it is my duty again to call such a development to the attention of the Congress.

On Monday my able colleague and I reported that the Federal Maritime Board, all of whose members were appointed by the President of the United States, had just allowed a new 10-percent freight rate increase on shipments to Alaska to go into effect without even hearing the evidence. This followed by but a few hours the appearance of the President of the United States before Congress to tell us in his state of the Union message of the dangers of inflation and to urge us that "we must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home."

I regret that with only 1 day intervening it is now my sad duty to report another departure by administration officials from the anti-inflationary policies so repeatedly proclaimed by the President himself. This departure is even more shocking than that which preceded it. In the case of the water freight rate increase, the interests of private carriers were involved. The regulatory agency—so called—went along with them. The new event is more shocking, and less excusable, because it it perpetrated by an administration agency, for an administration agency alone and unaided.

The Alaska Railroad, owned by the Federal Government and administered by the Interior Department, is also raising its rates. No private interests are involved. The railroad has no stockholders. It has no competitors. It is subject to no regulatory agency. It is a part of the administration. Ironically it is part and parcel of the same administration which keeps telling us that we must fight inflation.

The story of this most recent and most unconscionable inflationary action is told in a telegram which I have today dispatched to the Secretary of the Interior. The telegram is as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1960.

HON. FRED A. SEATON,
Secretary of the Interior,
Department of the Interior,
Washington, D.C.:

I have just learned with dismay that the Alaska Railroad apparently either has or is proposing to put into effect an increase in rates which will cost shippers an estimated $100,000 a year. I learned this from a newspaper account which did not say when the described increase would go into effect. Because of the complete absence of information, or even notification, I am unable even to speculate on whether the reported rate increase is necessary or just.

I think this is the first time that an action by a Federal Government agency seriously affecting a large number of my constituents has been taken since I have been in Congress without the Government officials involved even having the courtesy to notify me. As you know, things would be quite different if the Alaska Railroad were, like all other railroads, subject to Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction, which some are urging. It would then, at least, be required that the railroad would have to file public notice in advance when changes in its tariffs were planned.

To me it seems incongruous and shocking that at the very time President Eisenhower is addressing the Congress urging that "we must fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home" an agency of his administration is, without consultation of any kind, taking an action which is highly inflationary and doing it presumably with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior appointed by him.

I ask that you move immediately to stop this further attack on the living standards of Alaskans, coming as it does on top of a 10 percent increase in water freight rates to Alaska which the Federal Maritime Board has just permitted to go into effect following a 15 percent increase less than 2 years ago. I urge action by you not only on behalf of the people of Alaska, but also in accordance with the repeatedly proclaimed policies of the Eisenhower administration against inflation which I assume you embrace and would desire to carry beyond words into action which is meaningful for our fellow-citizens.

ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. President, I assure you I get no pleasure or satisfaction out of appearing here for the second time in 3 days to call attention to actions by Federal Government agencies which undeniably are inflationary and against the public interest. In discussing just 2 days ago the freight rate increase allowed by the Federal Maritime Board in ocean freight rates I felt compelled to refer to the action as "seaway robbery." Now we have a case of "railway robbery" perpetrated by an executive agency of the very administration which inveighs against everything inflationary.

It is difficult, Mr. President, for the Congress to fight inflation as we would a fire that imperils our home when these executive agencies are so busy piling on more fuel.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND BALANCED BUDGETS

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, from time to time some persons have been heard to say that those in and out of the administration who are concerned with balancing the budget ought to recognize that national defense is more important than balancing the budget.

If that were the choice, one would be disposed to agree with them, but the choice is not so simple. Our concern must be not only with an adequate national defense but also with a balanced budget, which, in my judgment, can be obtained within the range of the budget statement referred to by the President in his state of the Union address.

We have for this point of view a high precedent, which I should like to quote:

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes, that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties), ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

That is an excerpt from the Farewell Address of President Washington. It is still a good standard—paraphrasing President Washington—to which the lovers of liberty may repair. It is well to remember that national defense will indeed crumble under a continuous and too-long-extended unbalanced budget, because a stable and secure nation is one of the pillars of national defense.

Mr. President, I desire to address myself to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

ANTIRELIGIOUS OUTBREAKS EMPHASIZE IMPORTANCE OF CIVIL RIGHTS AND ANTIBOMBING LEGISLATION

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, it is with dismay and revulsion that I read of the current outbreak of anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic agitation. The situation has all the overtones of an international nightmare. The things people normally hold dear are no longer sacred and apparently sane men, women and children are behaving as if they were demented.

These developments call up the ugly memories of the 1930's and 1940's when the specter of Adolf Hitler stalked through Europe, slaughtering, defiling, and destroying. Although the situation today is not nearly so critical as it was 25 years ago, we cannot help but think that if mankind had acted more emphatically in the 1930's, perhaps some of the horrible bloodletting would not have occurred later.

The current outbreak of antireligious activity apparently began with the desecration of a synagogue in Cologne on Christmas Eve and has since spread to many places in Germany and from there to other countries.

This vandalism against religious buildings, both Jewish and Catholic, points up the concern many world leaders have expressed for the past 2 years about other trends in West Germany.

There have been an unprecedented outcropping of anti-Semitic literature, a series of cemetery and synagogue desecrations, smuggling of convicted Nazi offenders to Egypt, and a general softening toward former Nazi officials and toward neo-Nazi youth organizations.

Recently a survey was taken of West German students between the ages of 15 and 17. According to the study, 9 out of every 10 students either knew nothing about nazism or believed that, on the whole, Hitler was good for Germany.

I know that the West German Government is concerned about the recent outbreaks and that it is acting promptly to prosecute the offenders. But I urge that it go even further and undertake an educational campaign. The young people of Germany must understand that the rights of all persons are sacred, that any attack against a minority is an attack against the entire system of free government, and that antireligious and antiracial activity eats away at the very foundation of civilization.

But we who deplore antireligious activity abroad must accept full responsibility for the things which are happening within our own borders.

We must make it clear that our people, our Government, and our courts are on the side of human liberty. There is civil rights legislations before the Congress today which should be enacted.

The administration's seven civil rights proposals, of which I am one of the cosponsors, should be enacted promptly. I urge the Congress further to enact the bills which would restore title III to the Civil Rights Act and which would make bombings of houses of worship a Federal crime—both of which I have also cosponsored.

Mr. President, I call attention particularly to the antibombing measure. The vandalism committed against churches is just a step removed from bombings. I venture to say that it is in large part done by the same type of people, but those who might not have ready access to explosives.

We are dealing with people poisoned by hate. Each time they commit one act of violence they are encouraged to try another. We must protect our houses of worship from those demented persons.

Finally, I urge the Postmaster General to examine carefully the material which is being sent through the mails. These hate sheets are stimulating the vandals and the bombers. If we can prevent pornographic material from passing through the mails, we should be able to take similar action against other kinds of filth.

Mr. President, we in the United States have no past history by which we can explain away the things which have happened in the United States in the past 2 weeks. We have no unreconstructed elements which we believe some day will die off. We can make no excuses for swastikas smeared on synagogues, smashed windows in churches, and violent literature which urges our citizens to hate and defile.

We are a people who hold human rights to be sacred. We have a history of advancing the dignity of the individual. We must act promptly and thoroughly under the law to assure all peoples, including ourselves, that we are worthy of the traditions of our forefathers.

SPECIAL PRAYER SERVICES UPON CONVENING OF CONGRESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, upon the convening of Congress a number of churches in Washington held special prayer services. In times such as those in which we are living, it is apparent that the eyes of the God-fearing men and women of America are upon the Government of the United States, and frequently on the Congress.

We are also reminded that "unless the Lord build the house he labors in vain who builds it."

I have received a very fine letter from the pastor and assistant pastor of the Bethany Lutheran Church of Omaha, Nebr., concerning a special prayer service upon the opening of Congress. This service was held in Omaha. I ask unanimous consent that the letter, together with a copy of the prayer thereto attached, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and prayer were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BETHANY LUTHERAN CHURCH,
Omaha, Nebr., January 5, 1960.

The Honorable CARL CURTIS,
Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CURTIS: Back here in our good State of Nebraska we are thinking of you this week as a new session of the Congress convenes, and our thoughts are directed as prayers to the throne of God, asking His blessings upon you and your work of representing our good people in the Senate of the United States.

We recognize the tremendous problems that face our country, and thus face you as a Member of our highest legislative body. These many and varied problems in the economic field, in social relationships, and in foreign relations with other countries just cannot be solved by human ingenuity alone. Nor can human wisdom see a way out of the many dilemmas in which our beloved country finds itself. God's help and blessing is needed, and His wisdom must guide and direct us through these difficult days.

We are sure that in these busy and decisive days, you will be helped to know that the prayers of many of your constituents go to God's throne in your behalf. Therefore, we are enclosing a copy of the prayer which we used in our worship services last Sunday, January 3d, remembering particularly also, the beginning of the new Congress in Washington this week.

God bless you in your work and give you strength, health, and courage for your tasks.

Yours in Him,

LLOYD BEHNKEN,
Pastor.

DAVID LUDWIG,
Assistant Pastor.

Faithful God, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, humbly we acknowledge our sins and shortcomings of the year now past and ask You to forgive them, for the sake of our Savior who died for them on the cross of Calvary. Be with us to bless and guide us in the year that is ahead. Grant us renewed faith, greater trust, and more abundant love for You and Your work, that this new year may truly be a year of grace in which, through worship and study and service, we draw ever closer to the fires of your love and grow day by day into better Christians, and more devoted disciples. On the pastors and teachers of Your word throughout the world give wisdom and understanding that they may preach Your word with power and teach it in its truth and purity. Bless the missionaries throughout the world who take Your word for us to others, and cheer them in their difficulties and moments of danger. Bestow Your special blessing also upon the students and servicemen of our congregation who have been home for the holiday season, and are now returning to their places of study and duty. Guide them all, absent from us in the service and away at colleges and universities, that they may recognize that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and that they may feel Your presence always to sustain and bless them. Bless our country and guide our President and his advisers in these trying and difficult days, that we may be led in paths of peace with all nations, and live in the respect and good will of others, through the righteous and upright conduct of our affairs. Give wisdom to Senators CURTIS and HRUSKA and Congressman CUNNINGHAM who represent us in the Congress soon to convene in our Nation's Capitol. Guide their consideration of the economic problems before our land, the social problems that beset us, and the domestic and foreign relationships of our Government. We ask not, O Lord, only for superiority in arms and armor, in scientific advancement, in atomic research, and in space exploration, but for the humility and trust and responsibility to use the wisdom and power which You give in a way that will benefit mankind and honor You and Your will, and help us to live at peace and in security with freedom among all men. Let us all be Christ's men from head to foot in this new year before us, that recognizing the necessity and opportunity of the days in which we live, we may wake up to our call into your service and to the realities of life as You have given it to us. This we ask, O Lord, in the name and for the sake of our Lord and Savior, whom You named Jesus to remind us that He would save us from our sins. Amen.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, on July 23, 1959, as chairman of the Committtee on Rules and Administration, I reported to the Senate from that committee an original bill which was entitled "The Federal Elections Act of 1959." There is a long history behind the culminating fact of the reporting of the bill and its appearance before the Senate for consideration today. I shall not burden the RECORD with too many particulars with respect to the history of the bill, but I wish to emphasize at the outset that what is before the Senate today, together with several amendments which will be offered, is the product of extensive hearings on several bills which have been reported, this being the third since 1955.

I think I can speak with some particular feeling, if not with a great measure of expertness, upon election matters, in view of the fact that I probably have served more time on the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections than any other Member of the Senate, with the possible exception of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], to whom we are paying tribute today. I do not know how long the Senator from Rhode Island served on that subcommittee. I served almost 6 years and then resigned because of my candidacy for reelection in 1956. But I served on that subcommittee from the time I came to the Senate to 1956, a part of the time as chairman of the subcommittee.

During that time we were engaged in many inquiries with respect to Federal elections and, indeed, several contests, complaints, examinations, and hearings. It was a very busy committee for a number of years, and our work really forced some of us, I feel certain, to the views and conclusions which are embodied in the proposed legislation and the several amendments which are expected to be offered.

The distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], who succeeded me as chairman of this subcommittee, did yeoman work in connection with the investigations relating to the campaign of 1956, to which I shall refer more specifically later. I wish to compliment him, too, upon his earnest devotion to this work, which is more or less a thankless and certainly not a spectacular job among the many jobs assigned to us who serve on many committees in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I am deeply grateful for the very generous compliment of my able and distinguished friend, the senior Senator from Missouri. The subject matter of the proposed legislation which he has brought before the Senate is a vexatious one, indeed; but it constitutes an area in which the right of the people to control the fate of their government, to give mandate and direction, must be safeguarded, else the power of the pocketbook may exercise an undue influence.

I have serious doubt that the bill as presented by the able Senator's committee is as strong as it should be. During the course of the debate, I shall offer amendments which will seek to strengthen the bill, as indeed, I understand, the chairman of the committee also proposes to do.

Mr. HENNINGS. I propose to offer several amendments. The Senator from Tennessee and I have discussed these matters several times, so many of the amendments will be the result of our composite thought and efforts.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator from Missouri. I shall be laboring by his side, I am sure, in behalf of most of the amendments which he will present, although that may not be true in all cases.

I congratulate the Senator from Missouri upon the long, diligent, sustained study, interest, and effort which he has devoted to this subject. I hope his efforts will be crowned by the enactment of satisfactory legislation.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for his contribution to the discussion.

It might be observed, as an inevitable corollary, that no one as an individual really takes too kindly or too enthusiastically to regulating himself; and the same thing is true of legislative bodies. The same thing may also be said in regard to bureaus and agencies of the Federal Government and in regard to private and other organizations.

But, Mr. President, at the outset I wish to point out that in the year 1960, in many respects the bill constitutes a great liberalization of the so-called, and certainly misnamed, Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, because here we are, 35 years later, undertaking to operate and invoke the same rules, procedures, and limitations which were in force back in the year 1925. The bill before us increases by five times the amount which a Senator may spend in connection with his election; and likewise increases by five times the amount which the 1925 act permitted to be spent in connection with the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

Let us bear in mind, too, Mr. President, the change in the value of the dollar. Obviously the amounts provided in the bill were not arbitrarily selected. We had to arrive at some ceiling, some point beyond which we thought election expenses should not go.

But presently the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 is as obsolete as the brass-bound Ford, and is as unworkable, as unmanageable, and as out of date as most of the other products of that period. Certainly the fiscal limitations which could properly be applied to such elections in 1925 are not at all adequate for application to the elections in the year 1960.

Mr. President, I believe I would be remiss if I did not extend and present my thanks to the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] of Texas and the other members of the policy committee of the majority party for unanimously clearing this bill for Senate floor consideration.

I may say in all candor that on yesterday I indicated to the members of that committee that certain amendments would be offered; and I undertook to suggest what those amendments would be. Nonetheless, the bill was unanimously cleared by the majority policy committee for consideration on the floor.

Mr. President, I also believe it appropriate to thank the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], who joined with all the other minority members of the Committee on Rules and Administration in the effort to bring the bill to the floor, for Senate consideration.

So the bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Rules and Administration, and it has received a unanimous vote by the majority policy committee, for Senate consideration.

Many of us think that it is, indeed, good for the bill to be made the first order of business in this very important election year.

Certainly the bill is not, by its terms, in any respect that I can conceive, partisan in nature; and certainly it is not intended to be such.

The new clean elections bill—as it might be referred to—was adopted by the Committee on Rules and Administration after an exhaustive study in a series of executive sessions. This new legislative project is thus the outcome of thorough examination; and, as I have suggested, it bears the imprint of the spirit of compromise which brought together divergent, and often contrary, views.

In the course of my remarks, Mr. President, I shall point out parts of the bill with which I do not agree, and which I would like to see amended by the Senate. At this point, however, I wish to emphasize that this unanimously reported bill is a testimonial and an expression of bipartisan recognition that the basic Federal elections statute—the so-called Corrupt Practices Act of 1925—is hopelessly out of date in some of its important aspects, and that in many, many instances, it has been contemptuously and flagrantly avoided, evaded, and disregarded.

As all of us know, under the Constitution, Congress is given extensive powers to regulate Federal elections. The Constitution grants to the States the power to determine the qualifications of electors who vote for congressional candidates, and the manner of appointing presidential and vice-presidential electors. However, Congress is granted the power to regulate the time and manner of electing Senators and Representatives. Congress can also change the places of choosing Representatives. Moreover, Congress is given the exclusive power to judge election returns and the qualifications of its Members. In addition, the "necessary and proper" clause places at the disposal of Congress adequate legislative means to make effective the specific grants in the field of elections.

The Supreme Court of the United States has fully recognized the power of Congress to regulate Federal elections, and especially to pass laws for the control of campaign financing, so as to prevent the corrupt use of money to affect elections. In Burroughs and Cannon v. U.S. (290 U.S. 534, 1934), the Court said:

> The importance of his [the President's] election and the vital character of its relation to and effect upon the welfare and safety of the whole people cannot be too strongly stated. To say that Congress is without power to pass appropriate legislation to safeguard such an election from the improper use of money to influence the result is to deny to the Nation in a vital particular the power of self-protection. Congress, undoubtedly, possesses that power, as it possesses every other power essential to preserve the departments and institutions of the general government from impairment or destruction, whether threatened by force or by corruption.

In that decision, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed its earlier pronouncements sustaining the constitutionality of the first comprehensive Federal statute—the Enforcement Act (16 Stat. 44)—so far as it relates to congressional elections. (Ex parte Siebold, 100 U.S. 371 (1880).)

When, in 1894, Congress repealed almost all of the provisions of the Enforcement Act (28 Stat. 36), it was a matter of political decision, not a matter of determining the right or the authority of the Congress so to legislate.

A new period in the history of Federal regulation of national elections began in 1907 when Congress passed the Tillman Act prohibiting national banks and corporations from making contributions in connection with Federal elections (34 Stat. 814). In an amended form which includes labor organizations within the prohibition, as well as expenditures along with contributions, the Tillman Act appears today as a provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I mention this in order to remind Senators that the present bill does not deal with this provision of Taft-Hartley. I know full well that this statute and even the soundness of its underlying principles have been questioned and debated. Nevertheless, the issues raised have not been sufficiently investigated, and it is certainly my confirmed conviction that any legislation touching section 610 would be at this point premature. The administration of this statute by the courts has, up to now, satisfactorily resolved the controversies involved.

In 1910, Congress enacted a comprehensive statute which was the model of the existing Corrupt Practices Act. In subsequent years, the statute of 1910 was amended, and in 1925, the existing law, the so-called Corrupt Practices Act, was passed.

Many years ago when I served in the House of Representatives, it became clear to me, as it certainly did to many others, that the existing election law was completely inadequate and that a thorough revision was absolutely necessary.

As I said, when I first came to the Senate in 1950, we embarked on the so-called Maryland investigation in the first week of my term of office; and from then on the committee of which I was a member was exceedingly active in matters relating to Federal elections.

For several years, I was chairman of this subcommittee which deals with our election laws. My experience in investigations of elections and complaints, as well as in election contests, confirmed my views that we needed a much stronger statute.

Mr. President, with the thought that we need a much stronger and a much more realistic elections law, on January 21, 1955, together with other Senators, I introduced the first of a series of so-called elections bills. At that time the urgency of the need for a new Federal elections act was not widely recognized.

However, hearings were held from April 12 to May 18, 1955, on that bill by the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections. The hearings were lengthy, and, I may say, among other witnesses, the then chairman of the Republican National Committee and the then chairman of the Democratic National Committee appeared and testified. After these hearings, it seemed fully demonstrated that there were great deficiencies in the existing law. Those hearings included virtually anyone who had anything to say upon this subject.

It was a matter of great satisfaction to me when, subsequently, on June 22, 1955, the full Committee on Rules and Administration acted on the recommendations of the subcommittee to report the bill to the Senate. It was disappointing, however, that in its action, the committee split along party lines.

I think many of us have now come to believe that questions of revising Federal election laws should lie outside the area of partisan politics, as that phrase is generally understood.

Yet my disappointment did not end there. It was disheartening that the Senate, as a body, never acted on the bill. The sense of urgency was obviously lacking. There was no keen realization of the dangers inherent in election laws inadequate for the existence and development of democratic institutions in this country.

Gradually things have changed for the better. The press has done a great deal to call attention to the various weaknesses of our election laws, as have political scientists, leaders of various groups, and others who have taken the interest citizens should take in their Government, and especially in this vital, and indeed critical area, of regulation, in order that democracy may be fulfilled at the very fount from which springs the power of the people in this country, and that is in the elections of those who are to represent them and who occupy places of trust and confidence in our system of government.

There were also two special investigations by the Senate. I refer to the hearings held by the Special Committee To Investigate Political Activities, Lobbying and Campaign Contributions in the fall of 1956; and to the hearings and statistical study conducted by the Senate Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections at the same time. The findings and recommendations of those committees were contained in the final report of the special committee and the report of the subcommittee, entitled "1956 General Election Campaigns."

These reports supplied valuable, though to some extent cumulative, information, but they certainly helped to alert and to form public opinion and to advise Congress on the desirability of a revision—and a speedy revision—of our antiquated, outmoded, archaic Federal election laws.

It was in this atmosphere of public interest that on May 23, 1957, I introduced another clean elections bill. The Committee on Rules and Administration, under my chairmanship, spent several weeks considering that bill.

The final action of the committee indicated that times had changed. Unlike the 1955 bill, the bill of 1957 was reported by a large bipartisan majority of seven against an equally bipartisan vote of two. It was thus demonstrated that, whatever our philosophy of government and legislative position, in matters of election law we were beginning to reach a common understanding as to the desirable shape of the new statute. The preponderant bipartisan support certainly indicated that the flagrant inadequacies of the existing law had become a matter of general recognition. The progress we made was indeed remarkable. I think we may all take satisfaction in the progress which was made.

However, in 1957 the first result was no different. Some of us believed that we should stay with this problem and that it should not be allowed to continue to gather dust and have nothing done about it. So we have before us today this new bill, reported with such unanimity by two agencies of this body.

Mr. President, the existing law rests upon the idea that the integrity of the election process can be safeguarded by keeping political contributions and expenditures within certain prescribed limitations, and, further, by requiring a disclosure of data involving the financing of political campaigns.

These are the basic principles of elections legislation. The new bill has imbedded in it, certainly, these tenets as its basic philosophy.

But the limitations imposed by the Corrupt Practices Act are hopelessly out of step with the rise in prices and cost of services, especially if we consider the cost of broadcasting and the ever-increasing importance of radio and television in political campaigns. Those instrumentalities were not factors in 1925, when the law under which we are now supposed to be operating was enacted. Certainly, the economic changes of the last decades have unhinged the entire scheme of limitations prescribed by existing law enacted 35 years ago, in 1925. It is indeed almost impossible to wage an adequate political campaign within the ceilings permissible under the existing law.

The present system, in view of the factors I have undertaken to outline, is hypocritical in the extreme, from beginning to end.

In pointing out some inadequacies, I do not wish to convey the idea that I consider money used in political campaigns a wicked and undesirable thing in itself.

We all know that the figures with regard to funds used in the elections have reached astronomical proportions in the great elections of today. These do not especially concern or disturb us. As elsewhere in public affairs, our concern is with secrecy and inadequacy of disclosure. When the light of publicity fails to illuminate all these happenings, about which the public has a right to know, there will always be some suspicion of corruption, even though there may be in fact none. There is always the danger that even an unjustified suspicion may tend to corrode the trust of the people in their representatives in government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to my able friend the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I concur in the sentiments expressed by the able Senator from Missouri. Does the Senator not think there is also a danger that by an undue weight of the pocketbook, an undue influence of money—particularly in regard to the use of mass media—the true will of the people, if truly ascertained, would be thwarted.

Mr. HENNINGS. Not only do I agree with that statement, but I also wish to say that there have been several elections cases, as the Senator well knows, in regard to which the Senate itself has determined excessive expenditures did influence the elections.

I know the Senator is a student of the precedents in regard to elections and recalls the cases to which I refer, without mentioning the names of the men who were elected to the Senate, who are now gone. We know that in at least one campaign it was found by the Senate that the excessive use of money did influence the election and that in fact the election was bought. That person was not seated as a result of the finding by the Senate.

Mr. GORE. The junior Senator from Tennessee is aware of those cases.

Is the situation not more dangerous now, with the greater facility for influencing public opinion? Is there not greater danger that money may unduly influence elections and thereby thwart a genuine popular will?

Mr. HENNINGS. In reply to my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, I wish to say, briefly, we know that science has made great progress in the media by which the messages of the parties and the candidates may be conveyed to the public. I speak, of course, of television and radio. I do not intend to exclude the ingenious devices of advertising for promulgating the sale of products by the clever and adroit use of words and pictures, by the creation of desires in people who perhaps have not thought they needed some of the things advertised, and probably do not know what to do with them when they get them, except to have a hard time meeting the payments on them.

We know there has developed in this country since 1925 a very large group of ladies and gentlemen who are known as members of the profession of advertising, which is, indeed, a legitimate American enterprise. They have had to be controlled and stepped upon occasionally by the FTC and other regulatory bodies, because of the manner in which they have represented the advertised products or ideas to the public.

We know there have been many who have devoted considerable time since 1925, and theretofore, perhaps, to various techniques of persuasion and influence.

On the other hand, I would not like to suggest that I believe there is any diminution in the ability of the American citizen to think for himself. I do not despair of the elective process simply because of the invocation of the techniques which have been suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. I think it does raise, seriously, the question of one candidate having adequate money and the other candidate having relatively little, and the question to what extent the latter candidate is able to project himself, his principles and his views, to the people to whom he is offering himself as a candidate, as compared to the man of unlimited means.

We know from history that in the old days in this country there were no restrictions whatsoever upon campaign expenditures. It was not until 1870 that some legislation on this subject was enacted. That legislation dealt with bribery, among other things. There was no registration of voters in the old days. There were very primitive practices at polling places. Somehow or other the Republic has survived and burgeoned in spite of these many things. I attribute that fact to the essential strength of the great republican form of government which we have in this democracy.

Sometimes we do pay a price for freedom. We believe in freedom of speech. We believe that the press should be able to print the advertisements of candidates. We believe that billboards should display their messages, and that television and radio should carry them. Within the limitations of fair comment, provided a candidate does not transgress the injunctions against libel, we allow very free and frank and candid discussion. I am all for that; and I do not for one minute wish to suggest that in the presentation of a candidate's case, either by himself or by others, any candidate should be any more severely restricted than he has been in the past, except to say that the weight of the moneybags should not be preponderant in determining the course of elections, especially when disclosure of the sources of the funds is not made.

From time to time there have been suggestions that there be no limitations at all upon campaign expenditures, but that full publicity be given to them. I would not say that my mind is closed to such a suggestion. However, some of us thought, at the beginning of a revision of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, that we should try to arrive at some reasonably realistic basis for campaign expenditures, within which a candidate could campaign, within which he could be honest when he reports, within which there would not be under-the-table, undercover money, within which, as one of the amendments I propose to offer will suggest, there could not be 100, 200, or 300 committees set up in a given State in order to avoid and evade what I think is one of the primary purposes of the act. The purpose is to avoid a proliferation or multiplicity of committees set up for the purpose of receiving funds to avoid the limitation upon campaign contributions.

When we get down to the essential basis, what we are trying to do is to help everyone be a little more forthright, considerably more realistic, and certainly less hypocritical when it comes to the business of campaigning. In my own experience, if I may be forgiven one illustration, I have run in six primaries. I have been nominated six times and elected six times, three times to the House, once as a district attorney of my State, and twice to the Senate. I know a little about what goes on in campaigns in a State of almost 5 million people. I have served on campaign finance committees, as have many other Senators. We have served on campaign committees for our friends. We have spent a great deal of our time in being reelected, and we have given of our time and efforts to others in the course of our lives.

We know that, by and large, the 1925 provisions in practice are not observed in spirit, even if they are in letter. There is no use in our trying to indulge in any pretension that people are living within the 1925 dollar value, in the light of 1960 campaign costs, any more than we live within the 1925 dollar in terms of anything else. But that is only one point I should like to mention at this stage of the preliminary discussion of the bill.

I do not know whether I have answered the question of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. I took a long time to do it. I did not intend to take so long.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has answered fully.

Mr. HENNINGS. As the Senator knows, this is one of those things which do not lend themselves especially to simplicity, unless great effort is made to be simple. That is what I am trying to do.

Many sections of the bill require reading, rereading, and close study. However, I have undertaken to outline the broad and basic philosophy of the bill.

As I have said before against the background of existing law, the new elections bill represents vast improvement. It puts an end to the pretense that election campaigns can be run within the ceilings of permissible expenditures established 35 years ago in a vastly different economic situation.

The existing law permits a candidate for Senator to spend $10,000 and a candidate for Representative $2,500.

Imagine that. I do not know what the population of the State of Maine is. I should say that the State of the distinguished occupant of the chair has a population of approximately 600,000. Some of us come from States with little larger populations. My State happens to have a population of nearly 5 million. A candidate could not begin to campaign in the city of St. Louis for that amount if he had one committee and spent only $10,000 in a campaign for the Senate, much less a candidate for the House of Representatives campaigning for $2,500.

We have seen some of the statements filed under the present Corrupt Practices Act, showing that candidate A or candidate B says he spent $22 to be nominated and $85 to be elected. That is the sort of thing that the proposed legislation is designed to stop, by making contributions public, putting people on notice as to who makes the campaign contributions, when they are made, and in what amounts.

I suppose there are some very good citizens who might contribute $5,000 to a candidate and expect nothing whatsoever in return for it. There are a number of citizens who have contributed $5,000, more or less, and who have been exceedingly disappointed when they found they were not getting anything in return for it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Is not the distintinguished Senator from Missouri aware of the fact that frequently an equal amount is contributed to both candidates for the same office, in order——

Mr. HENNINGS. Indeed.

Mr. KEATING. In order that there may be, particularly in a close election, no doubt afterward?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly right. He has been in many campaigns. Some of us know from experience that the president of a company might make a contribution to a candidate—for example, perhaps to my opponent—and the vice president would make a contribution to me. What some of them expect, we do not know, but I believe it is only consistent with human nature to face the fact that not a great many people give enormous amounts to individual candidates without expecting some personal benefit from making such a contribution, or, indeed, expecting some benefit from having given to the party in the majority in the Senate or in the House, or, indeed, in the White House. By that I do not mean merely for the promotion of good government. I mean other and sometimes sinister things.

The Senator from New York was not in the Chamber earlier when I undertook to compliment him as one of those who had worked with us on the bill and had helped us to submit a unanimous report on it, and who has associated himself with me, or I with him, in the offering of at least one amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate those remarks. If the Senator will yield further, his view is somewhat similar to mine, that it is very necessary to legislate in this field. I am happy that the bill has been brought before the Senate, and I shall support it. In certain respects, however, I believe it could be improved, as does the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate my friend's remarks. I think we agree that, in the ultimate, it is better to have this bill than no bill at all, and to bring us at least somewhere past the mid-20th century. Some of us hope for considerable and substantial improvement in the bill, and will offer amendments representative of our views.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once again?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The able Senator from Missouri has referred to the investigation which a subcommittee under my chairmanship conducted into campaign expenditures and contributions in the 1956 election. The findings which that investigation disclosed dramatically demonstrated that some of the influences which the late Senator Taft in his statement made public recently said brought about his defeat for the presidential nomination, materially brought about the election of President Eisenhower in 1952.

I shall, in the course of the debate on the pending bill give some details which I believe will prove interesting in that regard.

Mr. HENNINGS. I might say that the Senator from Tennessee sent out a number of questionnaires during the 1956 campaign to all the candidates in that election. The replies buttressed and supported us in our belief as to what really goes on behind the scenes when an important Federal election is taking place.

Mr. GORE. The Senator will recall that for the first time in the history of the country we cataloged in black and white $33 million—who contributed it, who received it, and what was done with it.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly correct. We have those records, and the figure of $33 million was cataloged, as the Senator says, and, under his supervision, was illuminated in all particulars.

Along with these $10,000 and $2,500 limitations the existing law provides also a formula under which congressional candidates may spend an amount obtained by multiplying 3 cents by the total number of votes cast in the last general election for all candidates for office which the candidate seeks. This formula, however, is subject to an overriding overall ceiling which limits a candidate for Senator to $25,000 and a candidate for Representative to $5,000.

Under the new bill, the ceiling is raised to $50,000 for a candidate for Senator and to $12,500 for a candidate for Representative. Under the alternative formula of the bill, the ceilings are ascertained by multiplying 20 cents by the first million of votes cast in the last election, or persons registered to vote in the present election for that particular office, and by multiplying 10 cents by such votes or registered voters in excess of 1 million. Furthermore, the ceillings of the existing law are subject to the ceiling provisions of State statutes, whereas, under the new bill, the Federal ceilings are controlling.

Similarly, the new bill provides for an increase of maximum contributions to, and expenditures by, interstate political committees. Under the existing law, political committees are not permitted to receive contributions in excess of $3 million, and the same ceiling applies to expenditures. As against this, the bill under consideration, the elections bill of 1959, establishes ceilings limited by the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the highest number of voters casting votes for all candidates for the office of presidential elector in any one of the last three elections for that office. Judging by the available figures, the amount of political contributions and expenditures under the bill would be about $12,500,000.

As I have said, the reporting provisions, dealing with the publicity to be given to contributions and expenditures, are exceedingly important.

Under the existing law, political committees and candidates for Representative file a report with the Clerk of the House, and senatorial candidates with the Secretary of the Senate. Under the new bill, the originals of all reports are to be filed with the Clerk of the House and copies of reports of senatorial candidates and political committees supporting candidates for President, Vice President, and Senator are to be filed with the Secretary of the Senate. Furthermore, under the new bill, copies of all reports are to be filed with the clerks of the U.S. district courts or authorized State officials.

The reason for the latter provision cannot be overemphasized. We all agreed on it.

Under the existing law, the reports are not readily available to the people of the States and congressional districts. By contrast, there is being established, under the new bill, the dissemination of reports on the local level where the election is being held, which would lead to a wide dissemination of information on the financial transactions of candidates and political committees, so that people locally may have access to these reports in the clerk's office or from State officials authorized by State law to keep such records.

Another provision of the new elections bill requires that every candidate must make—and I quote from the bill—

> Every reasonable effort to ascertain what political committees, or other committees, associations, or organizations of the State or district are supporting him by publication of advertisements in newspapers or other periodicals, by publication of pamphlets or circulars, by providing printed material, by radio or television broadcasting or by providing billboards or posters.

The bill further requires the candidate list such committees or organizations with the names and addresses of their officers. It provides that such listing shall not be construed as a ratification on the part of the reporting candidate. It gives him the opportunity to repudiate in his report any of the committees or organizations listed.

He does not have to say that he approves of the support of any organization, but he is given the opportunity to repudiate, in his report, any of the committees or organizations listed. He may candidly say, "I do not want the support of this, that, or the other group," even though he may be getting it. That would largely happen, of course, if he felt either that the support was from a source of which he did not approve or that the support was more of a burden than an aid.

The disclosure value of these provisions speaks for itself. I wish only to point out that these listing requirements cover intrastate as well as interstate committees.

Equally important for safeguarding the public knowledge in matters of campaign financing is the increase of time during which reports should be preserved. The existing law requires that recipients of reports should preserve them for a period of 2 years, and political committees should preserve the supporting data of their reports for a period of at least 2 years.

Under the new bill, those who receive reports—that is, U.S. district courts and other such public officials—will preserve them for a period of 6 years, and those who file reports are charged with the duty to preserve them for a period of 1 year.

Also helpful is the reduction in the number of reports by political committees. The existing law requires four reports annually in off-election years. Two additional preelection reports are required in election years. By contrast, the new elections bill requires only semiannual reports in off-election years which are due on June 30 and December 31. In election years, the bill requires one preelection report as of the 10th day next preceding the date of election and one post election report due on the 30th day following the election.

Mr. President, the importance of election law cannot be sufficiently emphasized. The elective process is the very source of our national life, the controlling force of our society. It is my strong conviction that we cannot afford to be negligent in matters which go to the foundations of our American democracy. Election reform is urgently needed and it will have to come. Therefore, I urge that the Senate approve the Elections Act of 1959, with certain amendments to be offered later.

The amendments which I intend to offer cover primaries, intrastate committees, an overall limitation on contributions, and the reporting of direct expenditures.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, is the Senator from Missouri finished?

Mr. HENNINGS. I was about to begin to offer amendments. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. No. When the Senator from Missouri is through with his presentation, I desire to make a brief general statement on the bill. Since the Senator wishes to proceed, I shall wait.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not want to preclude the Senator from Nebraska, who has been so cooperative in the Committee on Rules and Administration, from making any statement he wishes to present.

Mr. CURTIS. Was the Senator about to offer amendments?

Mr. HENNINGS. I have amendments which I had hoped might be taken up at this time. Has the Senator from Nebraska any amendments to offer?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I have no amendments.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, at this time I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, with the understanding that, by unanimous consent, I do not lose the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration for his courtesy, not only today, but also throughout the consideration of this measure in committee.

I wish to preface my remarks by paying tribute to another member of the committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], about whom many kind words have been spoken today. It has been my pleasure to serve with him on the committee. I hope he will have many fine days ahead. It will be a pleasure to have him here for the remainder of this year.

Mr. President, clean and honest elections are an objective of all. There is no dispute concerning the desirability of improving our elections and obtaining the widest possible citizen participation.

There is a difference of opinion on the methods and procedures for obtaining the desired objective. There is a difference of opinion wherein the responsibility should be lodged for the policing of political campaigns, including the financing thereof.

Problems are not necessarily solved by placing them in the hands of the Federal Government and, thus, removing them farther from the electorate. An addition to the Federal bureaucracy for any laudable purpose is not, per se, a solution to a problem. Individual citizens, local communities, and the sovereign States have a basic responsibility. There is no State in the Union which cannot have honest elections, including the complete and honest reporting of campaign expenditures, if a majority of the citizens of that State so desire.

Candidates for the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives are required, under existing law, to file a statement of their contributions and expenditures. That requirement is continued in S. 2436. Under existing law, only those committees which operate in two or more States, or are a branch or subsidiary of a national committee, are required to file a Federal report. S. 2436 continues with the same definition of a committee.

The Committee on Rules and Administration was faced with a considerable divergence of opinion about extending the Federal reporting requirement to intrastate committees. I think it would be a great mistake to do this. As a compromise, in the committee we agreed on the following language:

> It shall be the duty of every candidate to make every reasonable effort to ascertain what political committees or other committees, associations, or organizations in his State or district are supporting his candidacy by means of (1) publication of advertisements in newspapers or other periodicals, (2) publication of pamphlets or circulars, (3) providing printed material, (4) radio or television broadcasting, or (5) providing billboards or posters.
> The candidate shall enclose with the reports required to be filled a list of names of all such committees, associations, or organizations, together with the names and addresses of their chairmen and treasurers. Such lists shall be cumulative.
> The listing of committees, associations, and other organizations and their officers shall not be construed as a ratification by the candidate of any action by them and the candidate may, at his option, note in any such report a repudiation of the support of any such committee, association, or other organization.

This section should not add any undue burden to the candidate, because it refers to committees engaged in activities in connection with which the present law provides that someone must take responsibility for such acts.

The committee was in disagreement as to whether the Federal reporting requirements should be extended to primary elections. The committee decided not to include primaries, and I concur in that decision.

The law prohibits political expenditures on the part of corporations, national banks, and labor unions. There are widespread abuses, particularly in reference to enforcement of this provision as it relates to labor unions. It suffers from poor administration and poor enforcement.

These provisions of law should be enforced, not as antilabor or anticorporation activities, but because we favor individual rights. No stockholder should have his money spent without his consent in a political cause in which he does not believe. No laboring man or woman should be compelled to give financial aid directly or indirectly to candidates or to a political party not of his or her choice. But this is happening today. Some of our wage earners are compelled to support candidates and parties in order to hold their jobs even though they may be in total disagreement with the political principles which they must support. Some courts, as well as enforcing officers, have bowed to the great power of unions and have turned their backs on individual rights in this field. They should take a new look at the existing statute, and should interpret it in the light of the principle that an individual's right to choose whom he shall support politically is a basic American right, and should be totally free from coercion or compulsion.

In many of the States of the Union, compulsory union membership is permitted under the law. This means that an individual must stay in the union and must pay his dues or else he will lose his job. Most certainly in those cases, such an organization, with its power of compulsory membership, should not be engaged in politics. To do so is to trespass upon one of the most sacred rights that an individual has—namely, the right of choice in political matters.

If this bill is to be opened up for amendment, this problem should be dealt with. Among other things, the definition of "contribution" and the definition of "expenditure" should include "provision of paid manpower and paid personal services other than bona fide volunteers." We should also provide that if any union hereafter obtains a contract which calls for compulsory membership, the union shall take no part, directly or indirectly, in politics, because it is no longer a voluntary association.

Senate bill 2436 does raise the limit on the amount of money which can lawfully be spent by a candidate or a political party. This is commendable. Existing laws is antiquated in this regard. Present day campaigning, with the addition of television, is very expensive; and the limits on spending set forth in existing law are far too low. They are conducive to the use of a multiplicity of committees and a lack of centralization and responsibility in election spending.

Mr. President, the measure now before us is a compromise. It contains some good provisions, principally those in regard to raising the limits to practical amounts.

I suggest that the bill be passed without amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I wish to commend the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules and Administration for the statement he has made. He has stated what I understand to be the provisions of the pending bill. It is not a bill which suits everyone; but it is a compromise—the best we could work out.

I am sure the Senator from Nebraska feels as I do, namely, that the antiquated statute now on the books should at this time be brought up to date to the extent that we can do so by means of agreement here in the Senate.

If attempts are now made to add to the bill provisions not now in the existing law, perhaps a bill on this subject will be passed, but perhaps it will not be passed. Therefore, I shall oppose any such attempts; and I assume that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska feels the same way that I do about that matter.

Mr. CURTIS. I do; and I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his statement.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, again I wish to extend my thanks and my appreciation to the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], not only for his cooperation throughout the course of the committee's work on this measure, but also for the statement he has just concluded in this Chamber.

I have already paid my tribute to the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who has been a very great help in enabling us to get this measure out of committee.

However, Mr. President, I am constrained to say that I believe some strengthening amendments should be adopted.

I am advised by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] that he proposes to join me in regard to one amendment—that relating to political activities in primary elections; and I believe that there may be other amendments on which other Senators may reach agreement.

But I am thoroughly in agreement with my friend, the President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. HAYDEN], who has worked so diligently on this committee, of which he has been chairman, and also on the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections, when he says that the passage of some bill on this subject is certainly better than the failure to pass any such bill.

However, Mr. President, I do not believe we are faced with the prospect of failure to pass such a bill, or else I would not undertake to hazard the offering of amendments. I believe that some amendments at least will improve the measure as reported. It was reported because of the desire of all of us to bring to the floor of the Senate a measure for consideration and for ultimate passage.

At this time I am very glad to yield to the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, today we are presented with a historic opportunity to bring up to date the clearly outmoded provisions of the Federal election law. Enactment of Senate bill 2436, with appropriate amendment, will go a long way toward making fairer and more effective the election of Federal officeholders. I hope we do not let this chance escape us.

Anyone who has studied the provisions and the practical application of the Corrupt Practices Act recognizes that it has serious shortcomings. Many are attributable to the simple fact that the statute was enacted in 1925, and has not been amended since then.

In the interim the value of the dollar has declined sharply; the national population has increased greatly; and the use of television, air travel, and other developments has mushroomed the cost of political campaigning. It is high time that we modernized these obsolescent provisions of the act.

My basic philosophy with regard to measures regulating the election of Federal officials can be rather simply stated. It is my conviction that public disclosure of activities connected with the nomination and election of Federal officeholders is a basic part of the public's right to know about the operations of their Government. Such reporting will help prevent improper use of funds to influence elections and will raise the national level of campaigning. I believe that there are dangers inherent in the undisclosed and unregulated use of money in political campaigns, which may lead to temptations for corruption and chicanery.

I am sure we all agree that realistic limitations on campaign spending and contributions are necessary. None of us wants elections controlled by large expenditures from a few individuals or organizations. Such domination is clearly contrary to the basic concepts of our democratic system.

Starting from these basic premises, it is my position that limitations on campaign contributions and expenditures, combined with public disclosure of such matters—public disclosure is so important—offers the best antidote to possible misuse of such funds and to spoliation of the electoral process.

S. 2436 reflects this philosophy in large part and is therefore, in my judgment, a commendable step in the right direction. I do not believe for an instant that this measure, or any other measure, even if we amend it as I feel we ought to, contains all the answers. Unscrupulous people will still seek out loopholes and will exploit weaknesses in the law, and we must be ever vigilant to correct those shortcomings as they appear.

Nevertheless, passage of this bill will make the task of the dishonest a great deal harder and can improve substantially the Federal election process. I therefore support it strongly and urge its adoption, with at least one amendment which I shall discuss in a moment.

I am mindful of the fact that the passage of any legislation in this field is extremely difficult. As I have noted, no changes have been made in the Corrupt Practices Act since it became law in 1925. It is true that language was included in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 relating to elections, but that was, as we all know, in a rather limited field.

It is therefore significant that the bill before us was reported unanimously by the Senate Rules and Administration Committee, and I join the Chairman's commendation of the members of this committee, on both sides, for that action. As a member of that committee, I supported this proposal because I felt it was headed in the right direction and because I felt confident to a considerable degree that improving amendments could be added on the floor of the Senate. I shall deal with these changes later on.

Whenever legislation in this field is discussed, the question of the constitutionality of such actions is brought up—and perfectly properly so. My study of this aspect convinces me that there are firm constitutional foundations for congressional statutes relating to Federal elections.

The principle of checks and balances restricts both the States and the Federal Government in this field. Broadly speaking, the States exercise jurisdiction over the qualifications of voters, the manner of appointing presidential and vice-presidential electors, and the times, places, and method of elections for Members of the House and Senate.

The Federal Government, under the Constitution, is given the power to change such laws, with the exception that Congress does not have the power to change the places of choosing Senators. Congress clearly has the responsibility to judge elections, returns, and qualifications of Members of both bodies, and McCulloch against Maryland establishes the principle that the "necessary and proper" clause of the Constitution permits Congress to utilize its legislative function to put into effect specifically granted powers.

Congress thus has a rather wide field in which to legislate with regard to Federal elections, and while I am sympathetic to those who are concerned about the rights of States in this matter, I do feel it is incumbent upon Congress to lay down certain regulations and guidelines.

The specific provisions of the bill before us today will go a long way toward eliminating many of the bad practices which have arisen under the outmoded Corrupt Practices Act of 1925.

First, the bill significantly broadens the scope of the reports required of candidates and political committees. The number of off-election year reports is reduced from four to two, annually. In election years, instead of the two additional preelection reports, S. 2346 requires one before the election and one after. There are also various streamlining changes with regard to who must file reports, and a 3-day period of grace is provided for the filing date.

The bill, secondly, expands the dissemination of data on campaign spending with the requirement that copies of reports be filed on the local level. Under the existing law, political committees and candidates file with the Clerk of the House or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be. Under provisions of this bill, the originals of all reports are filed with the Clerk of the House and copies of reports by candidates for the Senate and political committees supporting nominees for President, Vice President, and Senator are to be filed with the Secretary of the Senate. In addition, copies of all reports are to be filed with the clerks of the appropriate U.S. district courts—in other words, in the district of residence of the candidate or the district where the principal office of a political committee is located, if it is a political committee that is doing the filing. In States where some State official is authorized to perform such duties, the bill requires that the copy be filed with that State officer.

The net effect of this aspect of the bill is to increase the opportunities for the public to know the facts about local campaigns in the areas where the campaigns took place.

The third major part of this bill raises the ceilings on contributions and expenditures to more realistic levels. These provisions will permit more effective campaigning and presentation of issues without the need to resort to devious means of financing.

S. 2436 raises substantially the ceiling on expenditures for congressional candidates. Under the present law the limit is $10,000 for the Senate and $2,500 for the House. This bill raises the ceiling to $50,000 for a Senator and $12,500 for a Representative.

S. 2436 also changes the alternate formula for campaign spending. The existing law permits an amount to be determined by multiplying 3 cents by the total number of votes cast at the last general election for the office which the particular candidate seeks. This sum is not to exceed $25,000 for candidates for the Senate and $5,000 for candidates for Representative or Resident Commissioner under the present law.

Under the alternate formula of the bill before us, a candidate may spend an amount equal to the higher of two formulas. One is found by multiplying 20 cents by the total number—not in excess of one million—votes cast in the last general election for that office, plus the amount obtained by multiplying 10 cents by the total number of such votes in excess of one million. That is one of the alternatives. The second amount is determined by multiplying 20 cents by the total number—not in excess of one million—of persons registered to vote in the general election for the office the candidate seeks, plus the amount obtained by multiplying 10 cents by the total number of persons in excess of one million. One has a choice as to which formula one wishes to employ in arriving at the ceiling for his campaign. There is no maximum set by this method in the bill.

I might also point out that this bill does not cancel out, and does not exempt, any candidate from complying with pertinent State laws, unless those laws are directly inconsistent with the Federal statute. This measure also clarifies the relation between Federal and State ceilings and makes clear that the Federal limitation is paramount.

S. 2436 also deals with the problem of maximum contributions to and expenditures by interstate political committees. The present law provides a flat ceiling of $3 million for expenditures by a political committee in any calendar year. Such a limit is no longer realistic, as I have previously pointed out.

This bill substitutes for a definite ceiling a formula for political committees operating in two or more States. Under this formula, the ceiling is determined by multiplying 20 cents "by the highest number of voters casting votes for all candidates for the office of presidential elector in any one of the last three elections for that office."

Mr. President, in broad outline these are the major provisions of the pending bill. I realize they are not perfect and that they do not provide answers to all the problems in this extremely complex field. I do contend they are far more realistic than the provisions of the present law and that they deserve our wholehearted support as steps in the right direction.

Enactment of this measure will mark, it seems to me, significant progress along the road to a modern and workable elections statute which will be fair to all concerned and which will make possible the fullest and frankest presentation of the issues to the American electorate by candidates for Federal office. I trust it will gain the wide support in this Chamber it so richly deserves.

Mr. President, in commending the bill to the favorable consideration of my colleagues, as I said before, I feel that at least one amendment is distinctly necessary. It is an amendment which I offered last August. It is printed and is on the desks of the various Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, the bill as a whole is laudable and is worthy of support. I shall support it, whatever may happen in the amendment stage, but it does seem to me that the bill is seriously deficient in that it expressly excludes from its purview primary elections and conventions and caucuses where political candidates are nominated. This is not a fatal flaw, but it is a near-fatal flaw which should be eliminated by amendment.

It is a well-known fact that in roughly one-third of our States today success in a primary is tantamount to election. In these States, obviously, the choosing of candidates is the only thing that counts, and to permit such selections to proceed without the same Federal regulations which govern elections in other States is both unjust and unfair.

If we are going to pass limitations on the conduct of Federal elections, let us not do a halfway job. In my view, it would be folly to pass this bill without including within its coverage general, special, or primary elections, including preferential primaries, and conventions or caucuses of political parties which are held to nominate candidates. That is just what this amendment would do.

Mr. President, I understand the amendment is about to be offered by my distinguished chairman, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. I join him in offering it, if his amendment is the one we shall act upon.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to intervene at that point?

Mr. KEATING. I should be happy to.

Mr. HENNINGS. I simply wanted to reassure the Senator, as I did in the committee. The Senator will recall that I offered such an amendment in the committee, and it was voted down.

Mr. KEATING. By a very close vote.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from New York supported the amendment. The amendment was voted down, I think, by a margin of one. At any rate, I expect to have a few words to say upon the amendment.

When the Senator from New York concludes, I propose to offer the amendment. As I understand the situation, it is proposed that before we have further debate, and certainly before we have a vote on the amendment—and we expect to ask for the yeas and nays—there may be some other subject matters dealt with by other Senators who desire to speak this evening, so that tomorrow the amendment will be the pending business, and we hope we can proceed with consideration of it.

Mr. KEATING. I will say to my chairman, the distinguished Senator from Missouri, I hope we shall be able to convince the Members of the Senate of the merit of the amendment. I am happy to join with my colleague in offering the amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to have the strong right arm of the distinguished Senator from New York, who is one who advocates the amendment. I would not undertake to describe the amendment as being absolutely essential to the bettering of conditions by the bill of 1959, compared to that of 1925, but certainly, as the Senator suggested, this is most eminently desirable. We should face up to the entire elective process, which some of us believe includes primaries as well as general elections. We know that the selection of a candidate in a primary precedes the election of a candidate in the general election. All of this is part of the broad and general process of election.

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. For that reason some of us feel very strongly that to fail to acquire a provision relating to primaries would be a grievous mistake, and one which the Senate would have occasion to regret in the future. We know opportunities do not come to us very often to deal with proposed legislation affecting the manner and means by which Members of this body and other collateral and related bodies are elected. This may be the last chance for a long time to do anything about this matter. I hope we can embrace it and face up to it and recognize the ultimate and pervasive importance of it, as the Senator so well suggested.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate those remarks, Mr. President. I wish to make it very clear, lest it be misunderstood, that my position with respect to this is no way intended to impute that there are irregularities in those areas where nomination means election. It is simply based on a deep belief that our democratic system of elections functions best when the people are privy to all the facts and on the idea that when information is unnecessarily kept from the electorate there is cause for concern. Our system functions best when the vigilance of the people is based on full information.

The proposed amendment which would rectify this shortcoming is extremely simple. It merely includes within the definition of "election" in the bill primaries and nominating conventions or caucuses, and inserts at the proper places in the bill language to insure that such activities are included in its purview.

Mr. President, only by adopting this amendment can the Senate fully carry out the purpose of this bill to eliminate corruption and dishonesty at all levels in the selection of Federal elected officials, and give the American people full information about the electoral process from beginning to end. I hope it will win wide support.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I do not have the floor.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If no point of order is made, the Senator may yield for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I should like to ask the Senator if he would object to modifying the amendment to require the States to have primary elections. I can think of no more undemocratic process than that followed in States like New York, where there are no primary elections, where politicians may get together in smoke-filled rooms and select a candidate. The people have no real opportunity to say who the candidate of the party shall be. I should like to submit a proposed modification of the amendment, to require that the States have primary elections, so that the public can say who the candidate shall be. It is idle to talk about honest elections when bigwigs get together and the public at large has no real opportunity to say who the candidate shall be.

Mr. KEATING. My friend from Louisiana makes an interesting suggestion. He comes from a great State. I can understand his complete knowledge about the electoral process. In that State, as we all know, unusual events happen from time to time. We consider that in our great State of New York we have fully as democratic a system as has the Senator's State. Candidates in New York are selected by a State convention, and the delegates to that State convention are elected by the electorate.

Speaking for the junior Senator from New York, he was not chosen in any smoke-filled room. The only other person in the room with him at the time was the distinguished Governor of New York; and the Governor of New York does not smoke. So there was no selection in a smoke-filled room. The Governor of New York made the request that the junior Senator from New York join him on the ticket, and it was left to the convention to make the decision. If the convention had not agreed with the Governor of New York, the present junior Senator from New York would not be here. In my judgment, it is just as democratic to select candidates through delegates who are elected by the people as it is to have the candidates elected in a primary election.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Why not let the people vote?

Mr. KEATING. Are there no Republican primaries in Louisiana?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. No. They select a candidate and place his name on the ballot. The point is that candidates should be required to fight for their offices, and be approved by the public. The Senator wishes to regulate our primaries. Would he be willing to submit himself to a primary? If so, I should like to prepare an amendment——

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. I should like to ask the Senator if all these races and runoffs are not somewhat exhausting, both physically and financially, to a candidate, who then must confront a strong, vigorous Republican organization, standing in immutable opposition to the Democratic Party.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. We do not complain about it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Then he is required to go through a grueling ordeal, a trial by fire, a contest with the strong semblance of the Republican Party in the State of Louisiana. It is very trying.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It is a difficult thing, indeed.

Consider our situation in Louisiana. Eleven men ran for Governor. Then there was a runoff between the top two. One man who ran for the Democratic nomination for Governor 4 years previously could not get into the runoff in the Democratic primary election. He joined the Republican Party. Now the Democrat who was nominated must fight all over again. The candidate to whom I refer, who has joined the Republican Party, has a sidetrack to go into the final race, without ever having to submit himself to the public for approval.

If we are to have all these regulations providing for honest elections, why not provide for a primary election? The Senator from New York will not even submit himself to the kind of election we have in Louisiana.

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe we are to make the expenses of the caucus, which the distinguished Senator from New York has discussed, one of the elements of this amendment. The expenses of conventions and caususes are also to be limited and to be reported. So whether there are smoke-filled rooms, or rooms otherwise filled, for whatever purpose, all those expenses will be reported, under the terms of the amendment I am about to submit.

Mr. KEATING. Including the cost of cigarettes and all other smoke-producing materials.

I believe this is the most heartening thing I have heard about the Republican Party in recent weeks. I had not realized how much the distinguished Senator from Louisiana fears the forthcoming campaign against the Republican candidate in Louisiana. I had no idea of the seriousness of the threat to the present Democratic nominee for Governor, who has gone through so many campaigns and is so exhausted. It is heartening to hear that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana supports us. I am sure the Senator from Missouri is as happy as I am that he supports us, and that we shall have his strength behind the amendment. If he wishes to offer an amendment to it, we shall have to pass upon it when the time comes. But to hear him say that he will support our amendment is very heartening.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If the distinguished Senator from New York believes we should have an honest election, the first thing to do is to get the election. Here is a Senator who wishes to regulate elections, but he does not wish to submit himself to a primary election such as we have in our State. He would like to dictate how someone else is to be elected. I am for that, provided he subjects himself to the same type of contest which we face.

I am willing to run, Mr. President. That is the way I got here, and I expect that that is the way it will have to be. However, while I am willing to run against Republicans and Democrats, I believe it is not fair that my friends from the Republican side should come into my State and require Democrats to run in our campaigns in accordance with all these details and by going through all these machinations. I believe it would be fair if the Senator from New York would submit himself to the same problems that we have in my State, which he would like to regulate, and have him first run against Republicans and get the majority vote before he runs against a Democratic opponent. Of course, I have no doubt that the distinguished Senator from New York would be elected without any opposition, but why not prove it? He could do it if he would agree to accept an amendment I propose to offer to his amendment, to the effect that it would not be possible to have caucuses to nominate a candidate, or provide for a convention to nominate a candidate, but that it would be necessary in the parties for candidates to submit themselves to a primary, subject to the regulations that he could recommend. He should be willing to run under the rules he would recommend.

Mr. KEATING. I fear the Senator from Louisiana has not carefully read the amendment which the Senator from Missouri and the junior Senator from New York are offering. The amendment applies to both political parties. It is not directed against any one party. It requires for both parties that if there be a primary contest they would have to report what they spend in the primary election, just the same as they are required to report what they spend in the general election.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I am not quarreling with the reporting provision. The Senator from New York was not named in caucus. He said that Governor Rockefeller called him into his office and told him he was the nominee for the Senate on the Republican ticket, because Governor Rockefeller thought he should be elected. Why not have a Republican vote on it? It seems to me that it is much more undemocratic for the Governor of a great State to put a man on the ballot than it is to hold an election, even though the election may have some imperfections.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will interrupt the colloquy, although I do not wish in any way to limit the discussion.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, may I be permitted——

Mr. HENNINGS. I should like at this time to offer an amendment on behalf of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and myself, to revise the Federal election laws. I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. HENNINGS. I should like to have the amendments reported now so that they will be the pending business before the Senate tomorrow. I have no desire to interrupt any further colloquy.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Page 2, strike out lines 4 and 6, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) The term "election" includes a general, special, or primary election, including a preferential primary, and a convention or a caucus of a political party held for the purpose of nominating candidates.

Page 2, line 8, after the word "for" insert the words "nomination for, or".

Page 2, line 8, after the word "as" insert a comma.

Page 3, line 2, after the word "is" insert the words "nominated or".

Page 13, line 1, at the beginning of the line insert the following: "primaries, nominating conventions, caucuses, and".

Page 13, line 7, after "(2)" insert the following: "in the case of an election other than a caucus or nominating convention".

Page 15, strike out lines 20 to 22, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) The term "election" includes a general, special, or primary election, including a preferential primary, and a convention or a caucus of a political party held for the purpose of nominating candidates.

Page 15, line 24, after the word "for" insert the following: "nomination for, or".

Page 16, line 2, after the word "is" insert the words "nominated or".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to inquire of the Senator from Missouri whether he desires the amendments to be considered en bloc or separately.

Mr. HENNINGS. I ask that they be considered separately. The Chair is referring to the amendments I am offering, I assume. There are two amendments at the desk, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment read by the clerk is in several parts.

Mr. HENNINGS. There are other amendments at the desk. I am asking that the ones just read be considered en bloc.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is referring to the amendments which the clerk has just read.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. KEATING, and Mr. CHURCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I object.

Mr. HENNINGS. Before I——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not wish to detain my colleagues, but I should like to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendments which have just now been offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the distinguished Senator from Louisiana reserve his right to object?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I shall not object if——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana will state it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. So as to keep the record straight, I believe the Senator from Louisiana objected to the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I reserve my right to object, because I should like to protect myself regarding these amendments. I shall offer amendments to the amendments just offered. In other words, I will offer amendments to require that there be primary elections, which the Senators would seek to regulate.

That is why I entered an objection to the consideration of the amendments en bloc. Perhaps I shall withdraw that objection if I find that I have protected my rights. Under the circumstances, I would like to protect my rights. I will object unless it is agreed that amendments may be offered to the pending amendments. If that is agreed to, I shall not object to the consideration of the amendments en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard at this time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I believe objection was made on the basis that it would be withdrawn if the rights of the Senator from Louisiana were protected and with the understanding that he could offer an amendment to the pending amendments.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MANSFIELD. May I have a ruling by the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I must object, unless I have an understanding that any amendments I might offer to the amendments at the desk would be in order.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know whether under the parliamentary rules I have the right to make such an agreement.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any amendments I might wish to propose to these amendments may be in order. That is all I have in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Without objection, the amendments will be considered en bloc.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, at this time I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendments.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. Before proceeding with a discussion, tomorrow, of the so-called primary election-convention-caucus amendment, I shall undertake to yield to all Senators who desire to have the floor for various purposes. I first yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I have been asked by the distinguished assistant majority leader to announce to the Senate that there will be no votes during the remainder of the session today.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

INTEREST RATES ON TREASURY ISSUES

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, today the President has sent us a message on debt management. At this time I should like to read the message to the Senate:

To the Congress of the United States:

As I said in my state of the Union message, the Treasury is being prevented from taking debt management actions that are fully consistent with the public interest because of the artificial interest rate ceiling on new Treasury medium-term and long-term issues.

In a special message to the Congress on June 8, 1959, I urged the removal of this archaic restriction on flexible debt management. Congressional inaction on that request has resulted in a much more rapid increase in short-term debt than would otherwise have occurred. As a result, short-term Treasury borrowing costs have risen to the highest levels in several decades and the ability of debt management to operate in a manner consistent with sound principles of sustained economic growth has been seriously undermined.

I deem it imperative, therefore, that this restrictive ceiling be removed. I am asking the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Congress proposed legislation designed to attain this objective.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1960.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that such action by the Congress at this time would be contrary to the understanding we had at the close of the last session with the leadership, namely, that the Congress would not take up the matter of an increase in the interest rate on the public debt or other matters relating to suspension of the historic interest-rate ceiling on the debt until we had received a report following a long study by the committee, headed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], of the Banking and Currency Committee. I am advised that the report is nearing completion.

So it would seem inappropriate for the Finance Committee—which has jurisdiction of the proposed legislation which the President is now demanding and insisting upon—now to begin the hearings without having the advice of the Senate committee which has specialized in this field and has spent considerable time in studying it. Then we can consider whether it is necessary to take action contrary to a principle which has been observed since the days of George Washington, namely, that the Congress has the right to set a statutory ceiling on the interest rates on long-term Government debt.

I think this matter should be understood by the country, as the President casually calls this an "archaic restriction on flexible debt management." Let me say that I believe we are already being "flexed" to death by the constant escalation—by means of administration-inspired moves, which have broken all records in recent history—of the cost of money on the short-term market. I, for one, am unable to understand how the action now requested would lower the interest charges on the money Uncle Sam borrows, which already is running in excess of $9 billion a year, on what Calvin Coolidge used to call "the rent on the money."

Such expenditures really produce nothing for Uncle Sam. Today our interest cost is more than $4 billion a year above our interest costs in 1953, and increased by $1 billion during the last year.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator from Oklahoma inadvertently referred to the study being made by the committee headed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] as a study being made by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, whereas, as a matter of fact, the study is being made by the Joint Economic Committee, which includes among its members distinguished Members of the other body, as well as distinguished Members of the Senate.

A staff report on this whole subject has already been printed and distributed. I am happy to note that the staff report takes the same general position as the one the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is taking, although in the press the report has been widely misquoted.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania for that clarification.

Mr. President, certainly the step proposed by the President would be one of the most dangerous steps which the Congress could take, and I believe the issue involved is one of the most important to come before the Congress this year.

I do not know how much more strain in connection with the administration's high-interest-rate policy it will be possible to bear. The administration complains about the cost of borrowing the necessary funds. Yet the administration, through its various agencies, has done everything within its power to create the situation we now face and yet it now requests unlimited authority—authority never before enjoyed by any President in the history of our country. President Eisenhower asks for authority to wipe out all control over the interest rate on the long-term Government debt. Thus, in the dying days of this administration, we could be faced with Eisenhower bonds totaling hundreds of millions or billions, bearing a 5½ percent or 5¾ percent interest rate and running over 25 to 30 years.

If such a development were permitted to be made, if the Congress were foolish enough to yield to the request which now has been made of it, then, Mr. President, for the next 30 years the people of the country would have to pay the cost of that kind of mismanagement.

I do not think the Congress will buy that kind of a pig in a poke. I do not think the Congress intends to permit this administration—which claimed it wanted to inject business methods into Government operations—to do exactly the reverse of what every corporate manager would do. No corporate manager ever would attempt to finance long-term obligations at a time when interest rates were at their highest. Private business finances such long-term obligations when interest rates are low. At times when interest rates are at their peak—and at the present time they are virtually jumping over the moon—private business refinances its obligations on a short-term basis, and proceeds to use short-term financing until such time as the interest rates become lower.

Yet, Mr. President, today the administration is literally trying to drive the Congress—and let me say that I know of some of the pressures which have been put on the leaders of both congressional bodies—to pass the bill the President this year insists he needs.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield again to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Oklahoma agree that if this effort by the President, on behalf of the bankers and money lenders of the country, is successful, it will inevitably result in mortgaging the future of our children and our grandchildren, by loading on the country an entirely unnecessary burden of high-interest-rate debt?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator from Pennsylvania is absolutely right. It is asked these bonds be issued, without limit. The President does not suggest any limitation. He says, "Just trust me. Just trust our advisers"—these wonderful men who have made the interest rate jump over the moon, the very ones who have brought about the high interest rate crisis. We are asked to trust in them and told they will be able to manage the debt, which has been so grossly mismanaged until it is reaching a point almost of disaster.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Oklahoma will recall, will he not, that during a number of years of the Eisenhower administration, and in particular shortly after Mr. Robert Anderson became Secretary of the Treausry, interest rates were held down and that at that point it would have been entirely possible to refinance the long-term debt at interest rates hardly more than half of what they are now; and yet the Eisenhower administration never moved once to refinance the long-term debt? It waited until the interest rate was at the highest point before it asked for this move. I congratulate the Senator from Oklahoma for the speech he is making in opposition to it.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my distinguished colleague.

The reason given by the administration at that time was that we were in a sort of Eisenhower recession—which was not a recession in the eyes of the Republicans—and that we should not withdraw money from the market because the credit was necessary for business expansion. I know what the market was then. Money was free, loose, and ready to be loaned; but the administration did not take advantage of it, and we are now paying the price in terms of the very interest rate about which the President is screaming.

The President is now asking us to invade the long-term market at a time when money is tighter than ever, when the Federal Reserve Board should have tried to relieve the demand for money. Meanwhile, twiddling their thumbs in their ivory tower, the Federal Reserve Board has been going blissfully along, tightening up credit, making it more difficult for the smaller businesses to borrow at reasonable rates. Because the interest rate is much higher than the rediscount rate which exists in the prime money market, small business is suffering; and each rise in the discount rate by the Federal Reserve Board tells all the money lenders, who always wish to receive the maximum possible interest that can be charged, that they should demand higher and higher interest for the offerings Uncle Sam makes.

So we have a chain reaction because the men who are running the fiscal policies and financing the Government, which already has a debt of about $280 billion, are allowing interest rates to escalate upward; and the end is not in sight.

Now the administration asks us to put ourselves into a 20- or 30-year debt so that we may be able to pay off, in 20 or 30 years, the folly and stupidity of a policy which we hope after January 20 next year will not be carried over into the new administration. I feel the history of the Democratic policy has shown that it has always tried to prevent exorbitant interest rates both for the Government and other borrowers.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. McGEE. Will not the Senator agree that if the increases are made in bond rates now to be paid for the next 20 or 30 years, they will create security and stability for the Wall Street group?

Mr. MONRONEY. They will create security and stability and also windfall profits for them, because Wall Street is not dumb when it comes to making money for themselves; but a policy which means money for them means the outpouring of tax dollars by the public. If Wall Street investors can get their hands on new offerings of bonds that pay 5 percent or more, they will be able to sell them at a great premium once the new administration takes office and reverses the escalation of interest rates.

Wall Street does not have to keep the investments for 20 or 30 years. It can sell the bonds at premium rates and get windfall profits, in the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars, for taking advantage of the present tight money market—tight because this administration planned it that way—and at the same time it is nailing us to the cross of $4 billion in additional interest cost.

The administration's policy is resulting in higher interest rates to private business all over the country, because it is the Government rate that fixes the cost of borrowing money. No individual can hope to borrow, no matter how good his project nor how good his security, at a lower rate than the Government pays. This is the prime rate, because it represents the security and faith of the United States.

Mr. McGEE. Will the Senator agree that Wall Street can get more security out of such a policy by allowing that security to trickle down to those who have less security?

Mr. MONRONEY. I have never found that to be the case. It seems to me the trickle always ends when it leaves Wall Street.

Mr. McGEE. Is not this the philosophy that is offered in providing such an approach?

Mr. MONRONEY. We have always had tight money in Republican administrations. That kind of policy goes back through the history of our country, to the days of Andrew Jackson, when he had to move in and compete with the Bank of the United States, under the Biddle regime.

It always has been the policy of the Democratic Party to see that that trickle-down theory—which has always been discredited—is reversed. The Democrats have always followed the policy that prosperity must come from the ground level, and that from small business and wage earners comes a genuinely healthy prosperity, as nature nourishes the trees, foliage, flowers, and grain from the ground.

Mr. McGEE. Would not such a policy pursued for the benefit of Wall Street tend to save the people from inflation?

Mr. MONRONEY. That way of saving people from inflation is rather difficult for me to understand, because we have been told countless times that if we dared appropriate $50 million above the budget for a public health project or for cancer research or for the development of our natural resources, the expenditure of $50 million or $100 million would be inflationary.

We have been told we must not spend such additional amounts of money because they would increase the strain on the budget and create inflation—but at the same time we have been getting these lectures, every hour on the hour, because of our banker friends who run this administration, we have been increasing the budget—$1 billion even—during the last session of Congress by added interest costs. The cost of interest increased the budget $1 billion during the last session of Congress. That added to the cost $4 billion over the total sum for which the Democrats were handling practically the same amount of public debt.

So if it is appropriations that create inflation, as we have been told, then how do we escape inflation by an additional $4 billion cost for interest resulting from an erroneous and discredited policy? Yet the very men who have engineered that policy are asking us to give them power which no President since George Washington has ever had, and that is the power to issue long-term bonds without limitation as to interest, which they say is in the national interest.

We have found that some of the things which have been proclaimed by this administration to be in the national interest have been against the public interest. An additional interest cost of $4 billion to the taxpayers in the form of additional taxes certainly does not seem to me to be in the public interest.

Mr. McGEE. I wish to commend my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma for singling out what I think is the central question for the people to face in this very critical year. We can talk about peace. We can do wishful thinking about many other things. However, I think there is no greater issue at stake for the public to decide forthrightly than that of the whole economy of the country, which in effect has been strangled, as stated so well by the Senator from Oklahoma, by a tight money policy which is more concerned with the future security of a few in a very narrow area of the United States than with the productive capacity and the general welfare of the many.

I want to commend the Senator for his courage in bringing this subject before our people.

Interest rates also mean something to the people of Oklahoma and of Wyoming. These rates mean $200, $300 or $400 extra on the purchase of an automobile. They mean several thousand extra dollars on the purchase of a house. I think houses and automobiles and human necessities are far more important in bringing about increased productive capacity for the Nation than the securing of the highest possible interest rates for the bankers of Wall Street.

Again I commend the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank my distinguished friend for his valuable contribution, because, as he says, the added $4 billion which we must spend annually now, because of the excessive cost of interest under this administration, could be used to improve the productivity of our country, the condition of our small businesses and of our farmers. It could be available so that money could be lent at a reasonable rate. However, since it is being used for interest alone it is denied use for any other purpose.

If the Congress did not exceed the President's budget estimates and the interest costs could be reduced to the levels which the Democrats maintained before the Republican administration took over—I hope the Senators will understand this, because it is important—the very same $4 billion of excessive added interest rates we are paying today would be available to us to reduce the public debt. We therefore would drive down the interest rates, because we would be liquidating $4 billion of public debt each year.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. But the Republican administration, by getting the interest rate higher instead of liquidating the debt, compel the Government to keep spending more and more and more for the rent of the money, instead of retiring the debt itself.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Would not the action which the Senator advocates have retarded the inflationary forces and given us an opportunity to put the brakes on inflation, about which the President is so interested?

Mr. MONRONEY. It would have been the greatest single contribution which could have been made toward retarding inflation in a way which would not have been destructive. It would have meant taking out of circulation $4 billion in bonds—taking it out of the monetary base, for which the banks can issue credit of about 6 to 1 of their holdings of these bonds. Consequently, we would have been acting in a wise way and we would have been reducing the strain on the taxpayer. We would have eliminated not only $4 billion of outstanding debt, but the interest that must be paid each year on the additional $4 billion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. GORE. Does not the spiraling interest rate, conversely, have a very inflationary effect?

Mr. MONRONEY. I should say it does, because if the interest rate goes up, as it has gone up, for small business, for industry, for automobile manufacturers, for automobile buyers, and for all the various others who are affected by spiraling interest rates, there is an addition to the cost of living, to the cost of the product the customer buys, to the cost of equipment the small businessman buys, to the cost of the home the GI buys, and on through the chain. All of this must be reflected, because the wages of money, the same as the wages of the people, have to be accounted for in the ultimate price.

Despite this, the administration, which rails at the idea of increasing the minimum wage to a bare living existence amount, claiming it to be inflationary, thinks nothing about the added steps of inflationary cost for the interest component, for the wages of money, which business is paying, or which the finance companies are exacting as they finance the automobile so necessary for the workman's transit to and from work, or the home a man needs to live in, or many other factors which go into the cost of living.

Mr. McGEE and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

Mr. MONRONEY. I shall yield first to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, who was previously questioning me.

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, nothing more eloquently attests to the truth of the Senator's observation or to the point of the question of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee than the fact that the present administration is deploring inflation at a time of tight money. What better illustrates the fact that tight money does not obviate the fears of inflation?

I think this is a process involving considerably more than the inflating of the cost of a GI home. This process also inflates the cost of a Senator's home. Senators are people, too.

Mr. MONRONEY. And Senators buy their homes on time, I will say.

Mr. McGEE. I should like to give the Senator some figures which I think may be interesting at this point.

When I came to Washington a year ago I had to buy a house at what I suppose one would say was an inflated Washington, D.C., real estate price. It was a very simple house, but it cost, nonetheless, $27,000. Had I been able to finance my house in Washington, D.C., at the rate of interest which was the rate under the Truman administration instead of the rate of interest we are talking about now, which is being required by and requested by this administration, I would have been able to finance my house for approximately $9,000 less. I am not referring to eliminating interest charges; I simply refer to $9,000 less of interest charges. This is the result of the spiraling of interest rates.

This is why it seems to me the time has come to call a halt. Instead of being concerned, as the White House has been, about increasing maximum interest rates, I think the time has come to fight for maximum production rates, in contrast.

Mr. MONRONEY. I quite agree with the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. He is absolutely correct. This interest bite goes from the very lowest to the very highest, for living expenses, for payments on homes, and everything else.

I think the figures show that in the case of the average GI home the cost of interest has gone so high that the GI must at least sacrifice one room, and possibly one and a half rooms, if he is to have a house for the same money and for the same monthly payments; or, if he wishes to carry the loan longer, he can make payments for an additional 10 years, and finally own the same home.

This is the present, this is the gift, this is the legacy of a discredited policy which is being imposed upon the Government and which has been imposed upon the people of the country. Now we are being asked to compound the error. We are being asked to remove the historic ceiling which has existed through two world wars, through the war in Korea, through the great major depression, and through a whole series of minor Eisenhower recessions.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma regard it as an accurate statement that the President expressed dismay in his state of the Union message about the fact that in this year the total interest charges on our national debt will exceed $9 billion, and then went on to prescribe as his solution still higher interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. The higher interest rates are to be paid to lower the Government's interest costs. This is the neatest trick of the week, or of the year.

Mr. CHURCH. Is it not also an accurate statement that in 1953, when this administration took power, one of its first official acts was deliberately to increase the interest rate on the national debt?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. CHURCH. Does the Senator have available the figures to show what the total added cost has been to the taxpayers of the United States resulting from the increase in interest rates which has occurred since 1953, when this administration made that deliberate decision?

Mr. MONRONEY. I could get that information. I do not have it at this time because there was a quorum call, and I was not able to obtain it.

The figure now is $4 billion plus, perhaps $4½ billion added cost for the current year. It was about $3.5 billion last year. The cost has progressed upward with accelerating speed.

The more accustomed the bankers become to the friendly environment, shall we say, of big business in this administration, the greater has been the greed, the greater has been the insistence, and the greater has been the management of Government finances in behalf of these people, with a very valued assist downtown from every single agency of Government which has anything to do with the issuance of Government securities or of Government-guaranteed securities.

These are the Siamese twins. The nearest thing to a Government bond is a Government-guaranteed security; yet the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], and many other Democratic Senators have consistently called attention to the escalation of the Government guaranteed home mortgages, the GI home loans, and the FHA mortgages.

They started at about 4 percent. Gradually, with each session with the excuse that they wished to end the vicious discounting system, administration officials succeeded in persuading the homebuilders and building and loan people, and others, that the way to loosen up money, the way to avoid a vicious discount system, was to raise the interest rates on these GI loans. They had statutory authority to raise the rates on FHA loans. But as the interest rates on the GI loans were raised, it was necessary to raise the interest rates on FHA loans because they are so closely connected. But with each raise in the case of Government-guaranteed mortgages, which are most nearly comparable to Government bonds, they acted as an escalator to pull higher and ever higher the interest rates on Government bonds.

So the housing loans, which run into billions of dollars a year, find themselves again after the raise in competition with an escalating interest rate because of Government policies. So the administration comes back to the Congress and recommends a higher interest rate, an increase of one-half of 1 percent, or three-quarters of 1 percent, on guaranteed housing loans. That request is granted, and the Government bonds move up to their proper ratio with the legislated increase in the housing loans, which are guaranteed almost as though they were genuine Government securities.

So we have had the merriest song of escalation, to the great delight of Wall Street, those who control the limited amount of long-term investment capital.

No one has shown, in the Treasury's presentation, that anything done in raising the interest rate will bring a greater flow of long-term investment capital. The nearest we can come to relating long-term investment capital to Government bonds is that U.S. bonds draw from the same pool of long-term money from which Government guaranteed home mortgages, under the FHA and GI loans also are financed.

After being taken for a buggy ride four or five times, on the theory that raising interest rates would cause money to flow in, we find that they must be increased again and again. That theory should be discredited by now; yet we are asked to do it again.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is rendering a great service today in bringing this subject to our attention on the floor of the Senate. It seems to me that his service is in closest conformity with what has been the traditional role of the Democratic Party, as a party of the working people, of the farmers, of the small independent businessmen, who have opposed high interest rates.

By the same token, it seems to me that if Rip Van Winkle were to go to sleep at any given period in the history of this country, when he woke up all he would need to do would be to ask, "How high are the interest rates?" If they were up near the ceiling, he would know that the Republicans had taken over the national administration.

True to that kind of behavior, the present Republican administration undertook, as one of its first official acts, a deliberate move to increase the interest rate on the Federal debt.

As the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has so well pointed out, both with respect to the Government debt and with respect to the VA and FHA loans, each year the administration has come back to the Congress and said, "Do not be alarmed about the present interest rate. The real problem is to channel money in, to refinance the debts, to obtain the necessary capital for the FHA and Veterans' Administration loans. The solution to the problem is to increase the interest rate still further."

Here we are, 7 years later. None of these problems is solved, and the President of the United States expresses his dismay when he observes that the interest on the Federal debt in the present year exceeds $9 billion. His prescription is to raise interest rates still further. This seems to me to prove that these gentlemen cannot learn by experience. Let us hope that the Congress can. If our experience demonstrates that raising interest rates will solve none of these problems, but will merely aggravate them still further, let us profit by that experience.

Mr. MONRONEY. I could not agree more thoroughly with what my distinguished colleague from Idaho has said. He has been in the forefront of the fight against the great policy of error which is creating a crisis. We must understand that under this administration the things which happen in the administration are not necessarily known to the President.

Although his administration has been in power for 7 years, and is nearing the end of its term, he has only now become acutely aware of the fact that he has been able, through his policies and those of his administration, to double the interest cost, on approximately the same amount of public debt.

Then he says that the way to remedy the situation is to be able to pay more for interest, and to cement the high interest rate as a legacy, so that we shall never forget President Eisenhower as we pay off the 6, 7, 8, or 10 percent Government bonds which, over 30 years, is the answer to the Wall Street dream. This is better than "The Night Before Christmas." This is actually "The Night Before Christmas" throughout the year, or throughout the remainder of the present year, and up until January 20, 1961, when we hope an administration with fiscal sanity will take over and readjust.

We should put the Federal Reserve Board and the bank, as an agency of stabilization of this Government, at least on speaking terms with the facts of life. Today the Federal Reserve Bank holds practically no bonds which mature in less than 1 year, and this in a period of time when there is the greatest pressure on the long-term market, and when the Treasury is urging long-term investments and is willing to break the historic ceiling on the interest rate in order to get more money. But the Federal Reserve Board, an arm of the Government, is withdrawing from this element of investment.

I was amazed to read, on the New York Times financial page, the record-breaking interest rates, and the bargains which were available. The Federal Reserve could go into the open market and buy, at tremendous discounts, these very same Government bonds.

According to the New York Times of January 5, at the close 13 issues of Treasury debt were selling at prices to yield more than 5 percent. Eight issues were discount bills due from next June to October. The others were as follows: 2½s of November 1961, 5.2 percent; 3¾s of November 1962, 5.03 percent; 2¼s of August 1963, 5.09 percent; 2⅝s of February 1963, at 5.10 percent.

It would seem to me—and I do not have the total amount of this outstanding debt—that, if these issues are pending on the market, perhaps it might depress the interest rates demanded if the Federal Reserve were to make a few investments in the greatest and most stable credit in the world, the U.S. bonds, which are kicking around at this great discount. However, I suppose that would not be quite sporting in Republican circles, or that it might be called unfair, because it would be evidentiary material for the Wall Street bankers to advise, "We must bid above 5 percent so long as these terms are pending in these various issues."

They have been doing everything within their power to force up the interest rates. Consequently, we are in the dilemma of being asked to violate a course of action which has been in existence since George Washington's time and to give to President Eisenhower authority to put us deeper into debt.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true that the Constitution is very explicit in giving Congress the right to regulate our money?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is true. That is one of the prime duties of Congress.

Mr. PROXMIRE. As a matter of fact, the Constitution specifies that power in article I, section 8, subparagraphs 2 and 5, I believe. Is it not a fact that the President is asking us to relinquish the only remaining power we have over interest rates, when he asks us to raise the 4¼-percent interest limit.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. Until 1918 Congresses held the power with respect to the rate of interest and the power to set the amount of the debt issue. Under Carter Glass, in order to speed the financing of World War I Congress yielded its power to fix the debt issue amount and never got it back. Very few people know that Congress had that power or that it was traditional. Carter Glass was permitted by Congress to handle the financing of the war as to bond issue amounts but Congress fixed the long-term interest ceiling at 4¼ percent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. We talk about the erosion of legislative power. Would this proposal not be a surrender by Congress of a very important power which it still retains and which the Constitution explicitly and directly gives to Congress? Would it not be a surrender of that power to the Executive?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is true. Beyond that, it would be putting this power into the hands of whoever the President's designee was. I am sure it would not be the President himself, because I am confident he is even less familiar with this subject than he is with others. He would designate someone to exercise these powers. It would not be the Secretary of the Treasury, because he is busy with other things. It would be delegated to an old-fashioned, orthodox banker. There has been a quarantine in Government on new ideas which have been suggested even by Republican Members. The ideas which have been suggested to modernize savings bonds have been quarantined. As a matter of fact, in the case of savings bonds, we are still issuing a 1939 package in the year 1960. That has been the case with respect to the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], to revise the interest rate payments, so that they would carry a level rate, instead of the present payments.

Instead, they are following the orthodoxy of a past time, and thus we find ourselves without any new ideas on that subject. It is strange indeed that in a job of such magnitude so little marketing advice has been called in from the outside, other than from the moneylenders themselves. The rates that are suggested for these bonds come from the moneylenders themselves from the big Wall Street financiers. I do not believe that is in the best interest of the country.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Senator has referred, as have several of our other colleagues, to Wall Street. I am sure that when the Republicans hear us refer to Wall Street they think that the Democrats are reverting to it as a political symbol. We do not mean that at all.

I know that the Senator from Oklahoma and our other colleagues are conscientious and sincere, and certainly I could not be more serious in that regard. During the last congressional recess, while I was in my home State of Wisconsin, I made it a point to visit the small bankers. As a matter of fact, the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times said that President Eisenhower was calling on the bankers and others to talk to Senators and Representatives, to persuade them that the 4¼ percent limit should be eliminated.

I made it a point, while I was in Wisconsin, to talk to every smalltown banker in the towns I visited during the recess. As a result of my talking with these smalltown bankers I found that either they had no interest in the subject or they supported our position and were opposed to the position of the President of the United States.

They said, "If these interest rates continue to rise, we will be damaged, and we will lose money. Of course, it is true that we will receive more money on our loans, but we will be damaged."

The smalltown bankers have 50 or from 65 to 75 percent of their deposits in time deposits, against which they have to pay interest. The Wall Street bankers have only 3 or 4 or at most 6 percent of their deposits in time deposits. Their deposits are overwhelmingly in demand deposits.

Naturally the interest proposal is wonderful for Wall Street, but it does not help the small bankers at all. It does not help the local country bankers at all.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is absolutely right. Just as my colleague said earlier in the debate, "They have planned it that way." It was done by the "Humphrey-Dumphries," and has resulted in the present dilemma. If a small banker held $100,000 of these bonds at par, and they go down to 85—as has happened—they lose $15,000 by Mr. Humphrey's act. A burnt child hates fire. At the same time the Treasury cannot understand why small bankers, having been burnt by the bear raid by Wall Street on the "Humphrey-Dumphrey" issues, are not willing to buy more Government bonds.

They cannot understand why so many small bankers, at the very prospect that Congress might be willing to give what the President is asking for, should say, "Don't try to talk to us about any more bonds. We have had our bath. We have taken our licking. We do not want any more manipulations of this kind in Government bonds, We do not want any further decrease in the value of our bondholdings. We cannot afford to hold them." They are not prepared to take that kind of loss.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The small bankers are deeply concerned with the action of the Treasury inflating the 10-month 5-percent issue. I found in many cases they were deeply concerned. I do not wish to detain the Senator any longer or to interrupt him further, but I should like to address a few more remarks to him.

I should like to point out that the effect on the independent businessman and the home buyer and the car buyer is a kind of selective inflation. It is true that some economists believe that there may be some effect with respect to diminishing inflation if interest rates are increased. That theory has been advanced. However, the best that can be said for it is that it is channeling inflation into areas where it is necessary to borrow money to pay for money in order to make purchases.

It channels inflation into home buying and automobile buying, as the Senator from Oklahoma has said so well, and also, and particularly, into school construction and hospital construction. There is no question in my mind that the cost of the present hard-money policy to school construction has been greater than the benefit which would be received by the most generous proposal that has been made on the floor of the Senate to benefit school construction.

The increased cost to localities for building schools has simply been devastating because of the hard-money policy. The cost has increased 20, 30, or 40 percent, as the interest rate has increased since 1952.

Mr. MONRONEY. And the communities will be paying that debt for 20 or 30 years, because they are issuing long-term bonds at recordbreaking interest rates. It is a travesty on the future educational policies of the country to tie the smallest and least able communities to these bonds for 20 or more years because they are retirable only serially; they cannot be picked up and refinanced, as many of the blue ribbon or blue chip debentures can be.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It means also that many schools which should be built are not being built. Many hospitals which should be built are not being built. We talk about the importance of growth in our economy. All of us want it. Republicans and Democrats alike. But it is perfectly obvious that when 4, 5, or 6 percent of the working force of the Nation is unemployed, and a large part of our resources are unemployed, high interest rates are preventing us from getting the kind of production growth we need.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator from Wisconsin is correct. Has it ocurred to him—I am sure it has—that this policy is also doing a great disservice to our country, because it is becoming increasingly possible to accelerate the combinations of huge businesses by the liquidation of small business?

During the depression, I ran a small business. During times of tight money, the ability of small businessmen to borrow for their inventories, to carry their accounts, or perhaps to provide for expansion, is meager indeed. The banker is tougher and more grim looking. He wants a greater degree of security. With tighter money, he can be more selective. He can favor the rich, those more able to pay, those having the largest reserves. So it is often a psychological thing.

I have heard from many of my small-business friends, who say to me, "I am simply throwing in the sponge. I know the bank does not wish to carry me, because every time I renew my note, I am told I must reduce the amount materially, since money is tight, and interest rates are going up."

Many fine banks do not put the squeeze on their customers, particularly country banks and smaller banks, where the personal relationship has existed from father to son, and so on. But they are compelled to ask for an earlier liquidation of the loans. So after a few trips back and forth to the bank, and having the favor of renewal, and hearing a lecture from the banker of how tight money is, the borrower is told, "I do not think we will be able to renew the note the next time."

So the vision of what he can throw overboard in a liquidation sale makes that man's mind up that there is no place in this administration for small business. Bankruptcies are bad enough; but the voluntary liquidations which are taking place because of the tight money policy, and because of the cruel attrition in the financing, which was available under Democratic administrations to carry small business, are numerous.

Has the Senator noticed the increased number of appeals to see if anything can be done to help get a loan from the Small Business Administration? My mail has increased 10 times over what it was 10 years ago in this respect, because the normal sources of credit have been drying up, and in a last gasp of desperation borrowers are seeking to keep their small businesses alive.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have, indeed, noticed that. I am the chairman of the Subcommittee on Small Business of the Committee on Banking and Currency, so I am very conscious of the fact that the demands on the Small Business Administration have, as the Senator from Oklahoma has pointed out, increased greatly. It is a serious question as to how this problem can be solved. Obviously, the Small Business Administration cannot do it. This is but a tiny fraction of the number of businesses which need help. The great majority of small businesses may feel that no agency in Washington can help them. There are only a few which are active and aggressive and can do the job. The number of small businesses which need help, as the Senator has pointed out, constitute many hundreds.

Mr. MONRONEY. Has it occurred to the Senator from Wisconsin that the tight money policy can help create inflation? Let us say that all interest payments are deductible from the income tax. An interest payment of $1,000 by a person who is in the 25-percent bracket has small value as an income tax deduction. He gets some credit for it. But the people who are borrowing large sums today, and are willing to pay all the interest which is necessary to get the money—and suppose it runs 8 percent or 10 percent—and happen to be, as I am not, in the $200,000-a-year income bracket.

They can afford to pay 8 or 10 percent for the money. If they are in a high income tax bracket, such as the 90-percent bracket, they can deduct most of interest cost. So their net cost if they paid interest on a 10-percent basis, and were in the 90-percent bracket, would be only 1 percent. The Government would be subsidizing them for 9 percent. Yet these are the very sources of inflationary investment and expansion which exists today.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And there is discrimination. It is an advantage to the man who has an enormous income, and a disadvantage to the man who does not have it.

Mr. MONRONEY. The greater the income, the larger the tax subsidy, we might say, through the ductibility of the interest rate he pays. If he is in a high bracket, he can certainly do well. No wonder those who deal in big money are pushing the interest rates up, because they are freezing out the ribbon clerks. They are making it easy for those of wealth, particularly if Uncle Sam is footing nine-tenths of the bill for the interest rate they pay.

Small, hard-pressed corporations, like United States Steel, Bethlehem Steel, and Aluminum Corp. of America, with their huge earnings and their correspondingly large profits, are, through interest deductibility, letting Uncle Sam pick up 51 percent of the cost of all the interest they pay. So if they are borrowing money at 6 percent, the going, net rate to them is less than 3 percent. But the Government is "Uncle Sap." When he pays 5 percent, he is paying a real 5 percent. He cannot deduct as a business expense his own interest rate. He cannot deduct it from the budget or anywhere else. United States Steel, Aluminum Corp. of America, General Electric, and any other of the large corporations, and many of the medium-sized corporations, because of the deductibility feature with respect to interest, are actually borrowing money cheaper than Uncle Sam can borrow it.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The Senator from Oklahoma is aware, of course, that we Democrats are often branded by our colleagues across the aisle as reckless spenders. Is it not fair to say that most of those who so brand us are avowed backers of the Republican tight-money policy?

Mr. MONRONEY. I think all the test votes have shown that there are very few deviations from the Republican school of higher interest rates and tight money.

Mr. CHURCH. Does the Senator suppose that if those very gentlemen were given carte blanche authority to proceed to cut waste and to trim the fat from all the activities of the Government in every feasible way open to them, they could possibly effect a saving which would be so great as what their tight-money policy has cost the taxpayers of the country?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very glad the Senator from Idaho mentioned that. There is no means by which they could save in appropriations the $4 billion of extra added interest cost to Uncle Sam, let alone save the $20 billion or $30 billion it is costing the taxpayers, because of the higher interest rates they too must pay.

Perhaps it has occurred to the distinguished Senator from Idaho, who has been very much interested in this subject, as well as in others, that the earned income from interest is of a peculiar type. Perhaps the internal revenue laws were planned in that way; I do not know.

But if there is an $18 billion or $20 billion income from agriculture, as it increases, the tax is paid on the relative increase in the profits made. On the other hand, in the case of interest, there is somewhat of a difference. I think the Federal Reserve Board is estimating the amount of income from interest now at nearly $20 billion a year. The cost of $50 billion of our debt is relatively small, because the Government pays a low-interest rate to the American citizens who buy the defense bonds. Incidentally, they are the ones who have the greatest faith in the Government; they demonstrate that by their purchases of those bonds with their small savings. But they are receiving the lowest rate of interest. At a time when Wall Street is charging 5.1 percent or 5.9 percent or more, the American citizens who buy the defense bonds are accepting the low interest rate which those savings bonds bear. They have faith in Uncle Sam. The interest they collect usually is taxed as personal income, often in the 25- or 30-percent bracket.

On the other hand, the large amounts of short-term Government high interest obligations are held by insurance companies, savings institutions, and other large concerns; and the interest they receive on the Government obligations they purchase rarely gets back into the tax stream which results from the ordinary interest income. So the Government not only loses as a result of the tax deductibility of personal or corporate interest expense available to such large personal incomes, but the Government also fails to collect a full measure of taxes on the interest earned by those who can claim special privileges such as mutual insurance companies, mutual savings banks, and so forth, who have special tax privileges.

So we find that it all adds up to the establishment of a very favored position or a very nice, cozy little club, let us say.

However, there are some good signs. For instance, yesterday I was delighted to read in the New York Times that finally the great mystery of where one goes to buy a Government bond other than a defense bond is being solved by the small investors. I think that is important, because those who usually have controlled the strategy in connection with the merchandising and the marketing of such Government bonds have been rather secretive about the practice followed, and very few persons who had $1,000 or $2,000 or $5,000 to invest in other Government bonds seemed to know how to go about buying such securities.

So I was indeed delighted to read in yesterday's edition of the New York Times the following:

PUBLIC DISCOVERS U.S. BILL MARKET—INSTITUTIONS ARE SWAMPED BY INQUIRIES FOR THE NEW TREASURY ISSUE

(By Albert L. Kraus)

The public discovered the Treasury bill market yesterday and sent bankers scurrying to textbooks to help explain how it operates.

Mr. President, the dispatch came from New York—not from Oshkosh or Kalamazoo or Okmulgee, Okla.—and was published in the New York Times. From the article we learn that when the people demanded an opportunity to purchase the 5-percent Government bonds, in many cases it was necessary for the bankers to consult the textbooks, in order to determine how to explain just how the procedure operated.

I read further from the article, which was published in the New York Times on January 12:

Lured by predictions that the Treasury's special offering today of $1,500 million of 1-year bills might be sold at prices to bring investors 5 percent and possibly 5¼ percent, investors flooded banks, savings banks, and investment houses with inquiries about the issue.

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York, where bids will be accepted until 1:30 p.m. today, reported hundreds of telephone calls and a lineup of investors, cash in hand, ready to buy.

Mr. President, certainly that beats Macy's bargain basement. The public has found out what is going on in Wall Street, and they want in on the new, high yield, 5-percent Government bonds, which have so long been such a great mystery to the small investors who wanted to buy them.

I read further from the article:

By way of contrast, the regular weekly bill auctions yesterday occasioned only the routine interest of Government securities dealers and other professionals.

Mr. President, I have heard about professional wrestling being fixed; and now we are hearing about these professionals, according to the New York Times.

I read further:

Bankers, in many cases, were forced to confess to depositors who wanted to shift funds from savings accounts into the new bills that they weren't entirely sure how the auction worked. After a bit of quick research, however, a number were able to explain that—

Unlike other Government securities, which are usually sold at $1,000 and bear interest in regular installments, Treasury bills are sold at a discount from their redemption price. An investor realizes his return by appreciation of the bill to $1,000 at maturity.

Bills are sold at auction, with prices and return to investors determined by the strength of the bidding, in contrast to other Government securities which are offered at fixed interest rates. Thus, in contrast to the Treasury's offering last October of its "magic 5"—5-percent, 4-year, 10-month notes—the return to investors on today's bill offering won't be known until all the bids are in and tallied. This may not be until a late hour tonight.

Small investors may buy $1,000 to $400,000 in bills ($200,000 in the regular weekly auctions) without naming a price merely by indicating on their bids how many they want. This indicates their willingness to accept the average price determined in the competitive bidding.

These noncompetitive bids are then awarded in full. Competitive bidders, usually professional, have to take their chances with what is left.

Because of the considerable interest in today's issue, Government securities dealers estimated that the noncompetitive bidding might total $500 million, compared with their earlier estimates of $300 million. They guessed that this might cut the rate discount on the new issue to 5.05 to 5.10 percent.

Bankers said that while investors were flooding them with inquiries, withdrawals were smaller than those in October to purchase the "magic 5s." The Bowery Savings Banks, for instance, reported 60 withdrawals totaling $327,000. On the first day after announcement of the "magic 5s," it lost $3,400,000.

The article shows that if the public are let "in" on how to buy such Government bonds, they will not exact the last ounce of blood, by trying to reach the very top of the interest rate available.

In connection with this matter, about which even many of the New York bankers are uncertain at a time of crisis in obtaining funds to finance the Government.

Why has not our great Government, explained its fiscal facts of life? It has propaganda agencies by the score. In every department and agency in Washington they have writers who could get this information into the newspapers, and on the radio, and the television. This way they could show the people of the country how they, too, can enjoy a 5-percent return on a Government bond for 5 years or slightly less.

So, Mr. President, I think it high time for the Congress, after the report of the committee headed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], to hear from the Treasury. I am sure they will ask some very searching questions about why someone has not been "tending the store," why someone has not been taking affirmative action to reverse the ever-accelerating trend to stratospheric interest rates.

Two men could do that very easily. I venture to say that two speeches, if made in earnest, and if they demonstrated a determination to do something about this matter, could reverse this ever-accelerating trend that is leading to higher and higher interest rates. If President Eisenhower would state, in a speech, that this process has gone on long enough, and that the Government intends to move to break the bottleneck on the Government's financing and the ever-increasing exaction of interest; and, second, if Mr. Martin, the head of the Federal Reserve Board, would state in a speech that the Board is ready to go back into open market operations, which served the Government so well during the gigantic financial operations necessary in World War II—such action would lower the interest rates; and once they started to go down hill, I think they would continue to go down hill, because the operation that is keeping the interest rates at these high levels is more or less an artificial "bear" raid.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Did I correctly understand the Senator from Oklahoma to say that the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury, by changing their present policies, could lower the interest rates, without any substantial inflationary effect, by supporting the Government bond market?

Mr. MONRONEY. I certainly say so; and I would say that they themselves have the power, with the degree to which they go into open market operations where these bonds are placed, to limit in any way they wish the inflationary impact by their very operations.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator not agree with me that it would be most unwise for the Senate of the United States to consent to an increase in the interest debt ceiling unless and until the present monetary and fiscal policies of the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury were drastically changed?

Mr. MONRONEY. I would certainly say that is true; and I would say that putting this unlimited power in the hands of the men who have gotten us into this position would be foolish in the extreme. They have not demonstrated the competence to manage the public debt; and to give them the power to saddle us with such a recordbreaking interest rate for another 20 or 30 years would be the most tragic disservice to this Nation and to our children and children's children, who would have to pay for this folly, that the Congress could do.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has long been an expert on the subject of residential housing and construction. Does not the Senator agree that these high interest rates operate adversely on the construction of housing which is badly needed by the families of America?

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree; and I have the testimony and communications from almost all the homebuilders in my State, who now say the interest-rate cost and the shortage of money and the continued discounting of Government guaranteed mortgages are literally wrecking the homebuilding industry and denying the man with an average income the opportunity to buy and to provide for his family a home of minimum standards.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is familiar with the fact that there is a special subcommittee to investigate the subject of unemployment, the chairman of which is the Senator from Minnesota. I have the honor to serve on that committee. Will not the Senator from Oklahoma agree with me that reemployment and employment are being actively deterred by tight money and high interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. I certainly do, because the larger the percentage of the cost of buying or building that flows into interest, the lesser the amount that can flow into construction of housing or purchase of goods. It is obvious that the greater the diversion of money which must be made to pay "rent" on the money, as I have stated, the lesser the amount that can be paid for construction of houses or purchase of goods.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator agree that tight money and higher interest rates are inhibiting desirable increased national economic growth?

Mr. MONRONEY. I would say that, and agree to it, and also say that policy has added to the inflationary impact. There has never been during this period, while we have continued to have inflationary increases in our living costs, a shortage in supply of any single basic item I know of.

Mr. CLARK. So we do not have a situation of too much money chasing too few goods?

Mr. MONRONEY. There is no "classic inflation." Yet the administration, while every sign or scrap of evidence indicates this is not a "classic inflation," is giving us the remedy that is prescribed in the books on economics to treat "classic inflations." That is the same as giving a person a vaccination for smallpox when he has mumps.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Oklahoma has made reference to banks, with relation to the high interest policy. I wonder if he will join me in a unanimous-consent request that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point an article from the January 3, 1960, issue of the New York Times, entitled "Banks Will Show Record Earnings," from which it appears that 1959 was the most prosperous year in history for banks, and that was due largely to the interest rates?

Mr. MONRONEY. That must have been the segment of our economy to which the President referred when he spoke about the prosperity of the economy. He was not looking beyond Wall Street.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BANKS WILL SHOW RECORD EARNINGS—A HIGHER RETURN ON LOANS IS THE RESULT OF RISING RATES OF INTEREST—GAIN HERE PUT AT 13.8 PERCENT—1959 PROFIT INCREASE OF 9 PERCENT FOR BIG INSTITUTIONS IN OTHER AREAS SIGHTED

(By Albert L. Kraus)

Banks across the Nation will begin this week to report record operating earnings for 1959.

Unlike 1958, when the Federal Reserve permitted an increase of $15 billion in bank loans and investments, the improvement will reflect chiefly the banks' ability to clear a higher return on their portfolios.

For, although earnings assets rose less than $6 billion in 1959, rising interest rates permitted the banks to improve substantially their return on loans. From an average of 4.17 percent, the 1958 low point, interest rates on short-term business loans in 19 large cities had risen to 5.27 percent by September. In New York City, the rise was from 3.88 percent to 5.15 percent.

Not only have rising interest rates benefited banks' incomes, but the banks have continued to shift out of lower yielding Government securities into higher yielding business and consumer loans. In 1958, the banks added $8,200 million to their holdings of Government securities and those of Federal agencies. Last year, they sold $7,200 million. At the same time, they increased their loans to business $5,600 million, their mortgage loans and their consumer loans $2,700 million each.

SOME FEEL SQUEEZE

All banks, however, have not shared equally in the improvement in operating earnings. For "retail banks"—those dependent on the business of small savers and borrowers—the rising cost of savings deposits, of branch system operations and of promotion have kept expenses cheek-to-jowl behind climbing gross income.

For the "wholesale banks"—those dependent on large business customers—the tendency of corporations over recent years to hold their deposits to a minimum, to shop competitively for bank services, and to turn over their funds more rapidly has produced a similar squeeze on earnings.

On balance, however, the banks in the major money centers—and among these the "wholesale" banks—should show the greatest improvement for 1959. For one thing, although their return on loans tends to fall more rapidly than that of retail banks in a period of declining interest rates, it tends to rise more rapidly in a recovery. For another, their break-even points are lower.

BANKS HERE FARE WELL

M. A. Schapiro & Co., bank stock dealer, estimates that the 8 New York City banks among the 25 largest in the Nation should show a 13.8 percent increase in net operating earnings for 1959 over the level of 1958. In contrast, the other 17 banks—among them the big retail branch system banks on the Pacific coast—are expected to show a gain of only 9 percent.

The New York banks report capital funds equal to 11.8 percent of their deposits, the other 17, to 8.9 percent. Because of this relatively greater capitalization, the New York banks continue to show an operating return on capital funds smaller than other banks in the top 25, 9.38 percent against 10.73 percent. M. A. Schapiro & Co. notes, however, that the New York banks' return on capital has risen from 5.77 percent over the last 10 years.

Operating earnings do not tell the whole story of how the banks are doing. By definition, they exclude profits and losses on securities. And most banks will show sizable losses in their bond accounts for 1959.

But this is an entirely normal occurrence. As interest rates rise, the market value of securities in a bank's portfolio declines. Because the bulk of these securities are U.S. Government obligations, there is no question about their ultimately being redeemed at full value.

A bank may hold its bonds to maturity and avoid losses, but to do so will mean some sacrifice of return. Or it may realize its bond losses, obtain a tax benefit, and switch into higher yielding securities. The banks that show the largest bond losses, thus, often show the sharpest rise in operating earnings.

The choice between holding bonds to maturity and switching often is not simple. For some banks, realization of bond account losses may require dipping into undivided profits, part of the bank's capital funds.

For institutions unable or unwilling to raise additional capital, this means that acceptance of a lower rate of earnings growth sometimes is preferable to going outside the organization for funds.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have a request from the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] to have printed in the RECORD a statement in which he expresses his regret at being unable to be on the Senate floor at this time, and which is a commendation of the Senator from Oklahoma for the splendid address he has been making in the Senate this afternoon.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE

I regret that I am unable to be on the Senate floor at this time to commend the Senator from Oklahoma for the presentation he is making today.

The request of the President for higher interest rates on long-term Government bonds and on savings bonds is but another step in the direction of the tight-money, economic restriction policy his administration has continuously pursued. It was in February of 1953 that I became one of the first Senators to rise in the Senate to protest the interest rate boost announced by the newly inaugurated administration. Since then, its tight money policy has hampered the economic development of the entire Nation. Its adverse effect upon housing and consequently upon the lumber industry with which we are so concerned in Oregon has been documented time and again. Yet we are again being served up more of the same.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] has led the fight in the Senate for an interest rate policy on the financial transactions of the Federal Government which would encourage the steady economic growth of the Nation. He has been a wise and valiant leader in the interest of the American people on this matter, and I wish to associate myself with the views he is expressing.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I wish to commend the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma for the fine address he is making and for the thorough manner in which he is calling the attention of the people to the deleterious effect on our general economy of the unconscionable increase in interest rates.

I desire to say to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma that the homebuilders of Texas have stated to me that the effect on homebuilding in my State is exactly the same as that which the Senator stated it was in Oklahoma. It is interfering with housing construction. It is depriving many families of the opportunity to acquire homes. That is one phase of the problem.

I express my appreciation for the excellent and thorough manner in which the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma is bringing this matter to the attention of the Nation.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas. Mr. President, finally, in closing, I would merely like to say that, in addition to all the other things I have said about the lack of wisdom of giving this unlimited authority to the administration to pay higher interest rates in order to reduce the Government interest rate, another very cogent reason exists for not giving the President this authority. It is that the administration has never tried to use the 4¼-percent interest rate for which authority has been granted since 1918. How does the administration know it cannot sell bonds at 4¼ percent interest?

We know that in a rather tight market, on a short term slightly under 5 years, the "magic 5s" were tremendously oversubscribed.

Certainly without finding out what we should pay, in ways other than accepting the unverified word or perhaps the guess of those who manage the money market in New York, it might be wise to try out the 4¼-percent figure before we give President Eisenhower and the people who have put us in this fix authority no other President of the United States has ever had.

RECESS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 24 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 14, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Proverbs 9: 10: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.

Almighty God, may we now approach Thy throne of grace not only with our own individual needs and longings but with those of all mankind.

In penitence we confess that our prayers, so often in days gone by, have seemed to have been unanswered.

Inspire us to wait before Thee in deeper reverence and humility.

Purge our minds and hearts from doubts and misgivings and lift them by Thy spirit to the heights of courage and hope.

Help us to believe that nothing we ask and do in accordance with Thy divine and holy will shall pass away unheeded and unnoticed.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 12, 1960.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee effective immediately.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE E. SHIPLEY,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 417) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That GEORGE E. SHIPLEY, of Illinois, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Appropriations.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASSISTANT SUPERINTENDENT OF THE PRESS GALLERY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 418) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 1, 1960, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the basic rate of $5,300 per annum for the services of a special assistant superintendent of the House Press Gallery: Provided, however, That the authorization and appropriation herein contained shall terminate whenever a vacancy occurs in the position herein created.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CUBA—PATIENCE?

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, Americans should not be surprised that the Castro government has for the present rejected the formal protest by the U.S. Government of the seizure of American properties in Cuba without normal, legal processes and without any clear understanding as to reimbursement of the owners. We have previously given Cuba two notes on property confiscation and this third and last protest was delivered in the hope that the Castro government would discuss the situation. Instead, the Castro revolutionary government has promised to study the protest in due time.

No one can deny the sovereign right of the Castro government to establish a land reform program and to take properties to accomplish these purposes. In fact, the United States has long fostered and encouraged land reforms. However, law and justice dictate that the taking be equitable and that the property owners shall be fairly reimbursed for their investments.

Even the Cuban constitution declares that expropriated property should be paid for in cash at amounts fixed by the courts, and paid for in advance of expropriation.

Until now, the Castro government has claimed it cannot pay in cash and that payment for properties taken would be made in 4½ percent bonds, payable over 20 years in Cuban currency.

The United States protest does not deny the sovereign right of expropriation, but it does legitimately complain about seizures which violate every right and law, even Castro's law.

Since Dr. Castro has for the present refused to discuss this matter and has not given reasonable assurances regarding reimbursement for the properties taken, it is fair to assume, in fact I think it is quite clear, that he may never do so. Through various subterfuges the Castro government will rationalize its position of seizing property without fair and proper payment.

The planned Castro pattern is old, simple, brutal, and effective. Bite off one piece at a time; build up fictitious government liens against the property; the government takes the property when the liens cannot be paid. The owner is lucky to end up with his life. The Nazis did it to the Jews before World War II.

The only safe assumption which this country can make on further actions in Cuba is that Dr. Castro and his government will continue to follow the party line. This party line, among other things, includes continued anti-American feelings. Page 9 of the Russian political handbook calls this a necessary diversionary tactic designed and calculated to make you feel your oats.

Since the Castro government is sovereign, we must recognize the method of operation. The Doctor intends to amputate at once without anesthesia for the United States. Anesthesia for Cuba will be planned anti-American vilifications and tirades to cover up harsh and illegal acts; inequitable procedure; and justify national social reform which is liberal and which is opposed by the "Yankee imperialist." It is really unfortunate that Dr. Castro does not care or understand that those shopworn phrases are not original with him. Even worse, it appears that our good friends, the Cuban people, are clearly being driven down a blind alley—the orbit of a freedom-loving peoples republic according to a planned and prepared script.

One act of this play calls for Dr. Castro to become a martyr. The United States must be taunted into taking retaliatory military or economic action. This then will justify to the Cuban people, and the world, Dr. Castro's right to seek help and assistance from Cuba's real friends—the Communists.

Of course, it should surprise no one if Castro has already asked for that help and received assurances that he would get it.

In addition, he can then proceed with the completion of the peoples revolution and the establishment of the new order—the classless society. The hated foreigner and property owner would be gone—in fact all property owners would be gone. The campesinos workers are then armed and become mighty rulers. This idyllic play then comes to a screaming climax when the ruler and the ruling group of this classless society is properly rewarded.

Does this play sound familiar? It should; because it is as old as Marx and Lenin. But Castro thinks he wrote it with a new wrinkle and for Cubans only. But everyone else knows the real author of the tragedy. Since we all know what is going to happen in acts III and IV, we Americans must take steps necessary to insure that equity and justice will be had with respect to American property owners.

But we must not be trapped into ill-advised or hasty emotional action.

There is a great deal more involved than the $1 billion invested by Americans in Cuba. The freedom of the Cuban people is involved, and just as importantly, our freedom is involved.

Annually we buy millions of tons of sugar from Cuba. There are about 162 sugar mills operating in Cuba of which 51 are American-owned. We annually purchase from Cuba over 3 million tons of sugar. By law we guarantee an amount which Cuba may ship and sell in the United States at a favored price which is higher than that which can be obtained on the world market. Over 500,000 of the Cuban labor force receive take-home pay from this industry, and about 50 percent of Cuba's sugar is sold in the United States. Sugar is admittedly a major economic factor in the life of Cuba.

Since the United States is the largest sugar-consuming market in the world, we should consider several business propositions:

First. That Congress do not fix a quota for the importation of sugar into the United States but delegate that authority to the President of the United States.

This would give us more flexibility and would be a basis for negotiations between our two countries.

Second. Hold back funds paid for our sugar purchases from Cuba.

The price we pay Cuba fluctuates between 5 and 5½ cents per pound. The world price is approximately 3 cents per pound. We could hold back the differential of 2 cents a pound or $140 million a year. These moneys could be held in trust for the reimbursement of all American properties taken in Cuba at a fair value to be fixed by impartial appraisers.

Of course, there is always the possibility that Dr. Castro will, by way of retaliation, refuse to sell sugar to the United States.

If necessary, we can produce all the sugar the United States needs in the United States, or obtain it readily from other sources. In no time at all any sugar deficiency could be made up. The price might be higher for a while, but I am sure all Americans would be willing to make that sacrifice.

The sugar normally sold to the United States cannot today be absorbed on the world market. Dr. Castro then would be free to follow the planned and prepared party line by selling all of Cuba's sugar to the Communist bloc. The Red bloc would make good use of this deal by keeping these large amounts of sugar over the heads of Cuba. This would insure a course of conduct or to break their economic back at some other time more suitable to their international purpose.

But Castro's cohorts would much rather tell Cuba, the world and Dr. Castro that America forced him to turn to Cuba's friends. So America must not now be the instigator of doing away with the quota or refusing to buy Cuban sugar.

One thing remains clear. As conditions get worse in Cuba, the speeches will become more abusive; the Americans will be blamed for everything; one violent act will be followed by another; and turmoil will not subside in Cuba.

Planned politics has dictated this pattern, not Dr. Castro. The Cubans themselves, while willing to follow a great revolutionary movement and hero, like Dr. Castro, will with each passing day see for themselves that the revolution has not terminated.

REDEFINITION OF THE TERM "DISABILITY" IN THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, since coming to the Congress, I have been very much interested in the operation of our social security system. It has been my conviction for many years that one of the greatest pieces of legislation ever enacted by the Congress was the law setting up a program of social security benefits for the American people.

During the years since the enactment of the law, millions of men, women, and children have benefited by its provisions. Today social security is an accepted and integral part of our economic life.

There is one area within the framework of our present social security law that I believe the Congress should reexamine with a view to correcting a hardship that is being worked on thousands of our elderly disabled men and women.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to the present requirements in the law that must be met before a person can qualify for disability insurance benefits and the disability freeze. Under the rigid provisions of the present law and the decisions made thereunder by the Social Security Administration, it is impossible for many thousands of people otherwise considered totally disabled by competent medical authority and employers to secure disability insurance benefits or to qualify for the disability freeze.

If a person can perform any work, regardless of what it is or where it is or whether he has ever engaged in it, that person is precluded from disability benefits under the present law and the decisions made pursuant to it.

I realize that there must be some sound medical and employment rules to govern the determinations that are to be made in social security disability cases. However, from the countless cases that I have observed during the past several years, I feel that our present standards are too rigid and are impossible for thousands of deserving claimants to meet.

I have, therefore, Mr. Speaker, introduced today a bill which I believe will correct some of the main sources of inequity in the administration of our present social security system.

The bill does not change the definition of disability in the present law other than to provide that an individual shall be deemed unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity if he is unable, by reason of his physical or mental impairment, to engage in the occupation or employment last performed by him on a regular basis before the onset of such physical or mental impairment.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, when a person has been determined to be totally disabled from performing the duties necessary for the job or profession for which he is trained and in which he has worked for many years, he would, under the provisions of my bill, become eligible for disability benefits and the disability freeze.

Thousands of our people every year become totally disabled to perform their regular work. Many of these people have no other skills nor can they find employers willing to hire them if there should be some job they could possibly fill. As a result, these people suffer undue hardship and in many instances must turn to local welfare agencies for support.

I have observed numerous cases like this, and I am sure that my colleagues in the House have had the same experience.

The proper care of our elderly people is a duty that our country cannot shirk in this era of rapid industrial, social, and economic progress.

It is my hope, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues in the House will join me in passing this measure, which, if it becomes law, will offer a measure of hope for the security and well-being of many thousands of our people who cannot at the present time qualify for total disability benefits or the disability freeze under existing law.

THE LATE HONORABLE CLYDE L. GARRETT

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to officially announce to the House the death of the Honorable Clyde L. Garrett, a former Member of this body and a distinguished predecessor of mine, who died at Eastland, Tex., on December 18, 1959.

Many of you who served with him in the House will receive the news of the passing of Judge Garrett with a profound feeling of sorrow. You will remember him as I knew him personally, a kindly and considerate man who served his constituents, his State and his country with integrity and dedication.

Clyde L. Garrett had an illustrious career in public office. He was honored many times by the electorate in the community where he was born and reared and where people knew him intimately. This is always a great compliment to any man.

He served Eastland County, Tex., as county clerk and as county judge. While a county judge, he was president of the County Judges and Commissioners Association of Texas, a very high and signal honor.

He served in the U.S. House of Representatives in the 75th and 76th Congresses and, of course, those of you who served with him will remember him best in this period.

Subsequent to his leaving Congress, he held a highly responsible position with the Veterans' Administration as a loan guaranty officer, and retired in 1955 to return to Eastland, Tex., to be among his lifelong friends and to further contribute to the community life of that area.

His most recent activity prior to his death was that of president of the Eastland County Lyndon Johnson-for-President Club. In this capacity he had plans for active work in behalf of Senator JOHNSON for the Democratic nomination in 1960.

Our Nation, his community, and his neighbors have lost a valuable friend and a devoted leader in the passing of the Honorable Clyde L. Garrett.

I know that those of you who knew him here in the Congress will join with me in expressing deepest regrets and sincere sympathy to Mrs. Garrett, his two sons, Carl L. and Clyde W., and his three daughters, Mrs. L. E. Maley, Mrs. John Seeling, and Mrs. Paul Pate. It is our hope that they may find some consolation in the memory of a husband and father whose life was well spent in honorable service, and in knowing that a host of friends grieve his passing.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague in expressing sorrow by reason of the death of the Honorable Clyde L. Garrett.

I served with Judge Garrett in the House of Representatives for the 4 years he was a Member. I came to respect and admire his devotion to duty, his integrity and his courage.

He was a man who was exceedingly attentive to the problems of others and was always willing to lend a helping hand to his friends and to causes and problems in which they were interested.

In those days between 1937 and 1940, the issues of our Nation were acute and changed rapidly. Just prior to the war years there were many instances in which it was tremendously difficult to know what was right and what was wrong. It was a time when a thing may appear right as of today, and tomorrow would prove wrong, and vice versa. They were troubled times and times which required the most conscientious judgment. It was a time of change, a time of what might be termed adventure into the uncharted events which we now know were seriously confronting us. He met the issues of the day with the courage, the determination and convictions which identified him as one of the most able and most respected Members of this body.

I join with others in extending deepest sympathy to his very fine family.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who desire to do so may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and character of our late colleague, Mr. Garrett.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, when Judge Clyde L. Garrett, of Eastland, Tex., died this past December 18, I lost a personal friend, and his community lost a man who had contributed much to it over the many years which he served the people.

I came to Congress with Clyde Garrett in 1937, and had that close relationship which all of you recognize when you belong to the freshman class. It is natural that Members who started their service in the Congress together are drawn a little closer and have a feeling of affinity in the common experience. Before coming to the Congress, I claimed Clyde Garrett as a personal friend, and that friendship was cemented more closely during the 4 years he was a Member of the House. He had for years been the respected friend of my wife, whose family home was in Eastland, and of all of the members of our family. Continuously through the years that friendship has matured and grown to the very end of his life.

I attended the funeral of Judge Garrett in Eastland, Tex., and there witnessed the host of friends who came to pay their last respects. At that time, as during his life, he manifested a touch of greatness by reason of the friends about him. Every acquaintance knew Judge Garrett to be a loyal and sincere friend, and an outstanding Christian citizen.

It is with a profound sense of loss and a time of mourning which I feel at the loss of this friend.

I associate myself with you who have expressed similar sentiments, and in this way express my sympathy for his wife and the fine sons and daughters who survive him.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join today with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and other colleagues in taking note of the passing some time ago of the Honorable Clyde L. Garrett, a former colleague from Texas.

I knew Clyde Garrett before I came to Congress. I learned to know him intimately during his service here. He and I and our families were warm friends. While serving here, he demonstrated a devotion to duty and principle which marked him as a worthy and able servant of the people of his district and of the Nation as a whole.

Mr. Garrett was an humble man who sought diligently to do his job as a representative of the people. It was my privilege to cooperate with him on many matters of general interest to the people of west Texas. He served the people with devotion and effectiveness. I recall most pleasantly our associations together.

Mr. Garrett had the respect and confidence of his colleagues. He liked people and people liked him. Mr. Garrett was proud of his family and devoted to them. I pay tribute to our departed friend and join my colleagues today in words of sympathy to his loved ones left behind.

CONSTRUCTION OF FISHING VESSELS

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 5421) to provide a program of assistance to correct inequities in the construction of fishing vessels and to enable the fishing industry of the United States to regain a favorable economic status, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and request a conference with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees:

Messrs. BONNER, BOYKIN, GEORGE P. MILLER, TOLLEFSON, and VAN PELT.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been directed to the fact that one of the members of the Rules Committee: namely, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BROWN], my very dear friend, stated that I have not as yet requested hearings before the Rules Committee on the civil rights bill.

The gentleman from Idaho, [Mr. BUDGE], made a similar statement.

I regret to state that both of these gentlemen are in error. They are just as wrong as a 2-foot yardstick.

On August 21, 1959, I wrote to the chairman of the Rules Committee, and, among other things, stated:

> Pursuant to authorization of the Committee on the Judiciary, I am writing to request the Rules Committee to grant a rule for the consideration of this bill on the floor of the House. We would appreciate being given a hearing before your committee at the earliest convenient date.

Also the excuses given by some Republicans, especially the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HALLECK], for failure to sign the discharge petition to my mind are useless, just about as useless as trying to grow hair on my bald head.

WEST VIRGINIA IS GETTING SHORTCHANGED—XIV

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, last year on numerous occasions I spoke before this House about the shameful way in which my State of West Virginia has been discriminated against in the allocation of Federal spending and employment.

I pointed out that West Virginia was a dead last among the 50 States in Defense Department employment and total payroll. I further presented figures to indicate that the Commerce Department similarly neglected the Mountain State to the preferential treatment of all others.

Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that my State is not looking for a handout, nor for any undeserved treatment from any government agency. We want nothing more than fair and equitable treatment.

I hardly need to point out again that the State of West Virginia still is locked in the paralyzing coils of a great economic recession, and that the rate of unemployment is higher in our state than in any other in the Nation. It would seem that federal spending could reasonably be channeled when possible into such blighted areas—but instead, West Virginia actually suffers from a lack of installations and facilities that is grievously unfair.

Today I want to place new evidence of this fact before this House, to offer ample proof that Defense and Commerce are not alone in neglecting our most sorely depressed State.

Among the independent government agencies, this pattern of discrimination remains evident. I can offer facts to indicate that at least 15 Federal agencies have facilities scattered about the country—but none whatever in the State of West Virginia.

For example, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board operates in 32 States. It has no employees in West Virginia.

The Federal Communications Commission has facilities and employees in 26 States. It has no West Virginia facilities or employees.

The National Labor Relations Board has a payroll encompassing employees in 24 States. None of them are in West Virginia.

There are others. None of the following agencies have a single worker in West Virginia, although their operations are scattered about the country.

Securities Exchange Commission, 14 States.

National Mediation Board, 9 States.

General Accounting Office, 18 States.

Government Printing Office, 5 States.

Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization, 11 States.

Department of State, 21 States.

Atomic Energy Commission, 31 States.

Civil Aeronautics Board, 7 States.

Federal Communications Commission, 26 States.

Federal Power Commission, 5 States.

Federal Trade Commission, 11 States.

Government Contracts Commission, 2 States.

National Aeronautics and Space Administration, 4 States.

I have ignored several other agencies which would not be suited for West Virginia location because of geographical, historical, or other considerations. But I believe that this does indicate that West Virginia is being short-changed by these agencies, as well as a regrettably large number of others in the Federal Government, and that this shameful neglect deserves to be dragged into the spotlight of congressional and public scrutiny until remedial action is taken.

INTEREST ON THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all noted with great interest that portion of the President's State of the Union message in which he refers to the fact that he expects to have a $200 million surplus this year, and he looks forward to reducing the national debt. In the same message, we heard him urge, as he did again on yesterday, that we give the Treasury Department the right to increase the interest rate on long-term bonds. Why, he does not know, and he will never be able to tell us.

Let me point this out to you. If we increase the interest rate on the existing Government debt by only 1 percent a year, that means an increase in the annual expenditure of Government for interest alone of $2.9 billion, and if we succeed in reducing the national debt by the $4 billion that he talks about, the 1-percent increase in the cost of carrying that reduced debt will be two billion eight hundred sixty million dollars more a year.

He reminds me of our former colleague who, day after day, used to get up on this floor and shout—where will we get the money from?

I never thought I would be around here long enough to hear a President tell us in the same message he is going to reduce the national debt, create a budgetary surplus, spend as much as last year for Government except for defense. Where he will spend more, all by living within our means, and by keeping expenditures below revenues—all of this and at the same time increase the interest rate on Goverment debt. He did not say so, but that means billions of dollars of more expense per year to the Federal Government.

Magic, indeed, or, to use his own words "a storm of semantic disorder."

NEWS AND VIEWS ABOUT CASTRO'S CUBA

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous request that the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE] may extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I would like to include a synopsis of a lecture delivered at Hood College for Women, Frederick, Md., by my friend, the Reverend Father Joseph F. Thorning, Ph. D., D.D., associate editor of World Affairs and a specialist on inter-American affairs. It is good to note that myths about Fidel Castro's Cuba are being exploded, thanks to good reporters who dig up the facts and relate them without fear or favor.

The synopsis follows:

DR. THORNING CRITICAL OF MATTHEWS REPORTING

Addressing Town Hall, Hood College, Rev. Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Carrollton Manor, and U.S. honorary fellow of the Historical and Geographical Institute of Brail, noted what he called the sharp contrast between the excellent, factual reporting of Mrs. Ruby Hart Phillips, chief, the New York Times Bureau in Cuba, and the misleading dispatches and erroneous interpretations about Fidel Castro furnished by Herbert L. Matthews, a member of the editorial staff of the same great newspaper.

The Maryland author, educator, and diplomat added:

"There was a midsummer climax in what was something like a 'war between the States' within the ranks of New York Times newspaper people when, on July 16, 1959, Mr. Matthews wrote what was a virtual whitewash of the Castro dictatorship. The ink was hardly dry on this solvenly dispatch when the night managing editors of the Times had to rush down to the composing room and rip Matthews' story out of the later editions of the newspaper. It was this story that a Frederick County resident analyzed in a complete column in the Times on August 18, 1959.

"Since that date, as has been widely noted in national magazines, reviews, and the metropolitan press, the byline of Herbert L. Matthews has not appeared. Questions have been raised about this development. Most of these doubts can be resolved by emphasizing that there are plenty of responsible, topflight newspaper people on the Times staff. They realize that Mr. Matthews is not a good reporter. Consequently, not wishing their paper to become the laughing stock of the journalistic world, they have protested, apparently with no little effect, against Mr. Matthews taking over any news assignment.

"On the other hand, the name of Mrs. Ruby Hart Phillips is very much in evidence and the reports she is sending from Havanna indicate 'the triumph of the extreme left in the Cuban Government' as a result of the appointment of Maj. Ernesto Guevara to the post of president of the National Bank of Cuba.

"To be sure, unsigned editorials in the Times continue to reflect the news of Herbert L. Matthews. Some day, we may hope, this highly emotional, imaginative writer will recognize the Marxist nature of the Castro regime and do a better job on Cuba than he did in describing Italian Fascist victories over the innocent Ethiopians and in predicting the triumph of the leftwing forces in Spain during the Civil War. Mr. Matthews can learn a great deal by assimilating the facts reported by Ruby Phillips."

TITLE I PROJECT WINDFALLS

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, on June 16, 1959, in a formal letter of complaint to the Administrator of the Federal Housing and Home Finance, I charged that the Soundview title I project in New York City had the smell of a windfall and that the present owner of record for the land to be redeveloped was a dummy for a syndicate which stood to make a neat profit of one-half million dollars if the deal went through.

I also challenged the city slum-clearance committee's classification of this particular site as a slum area. I urged disapproval of this project, because the serious questions I raised regarding this land deal placed it under a cloud of suspicion.

Thereafter, on June 19, in a letter to the chairman of the Special Housing Subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee, I asked that a full and complete investigation be undertaken by his committee. In that letter, I pointed out several glaring examples of the shameful mismanagement of our urban renewal program in New York City. I concluded that the need for a congressional committee to dig into and clean up the entire title I mess was urgent.

On July 3 the minority members of this Special Housing Subcommittee, in a joint statement, expressed deep concern over charges of windfalls and conflicts of interest and demanded a thorough study of the program. They said that "these charges are of such serious nature as to make imperative an immediate investigation by the House Banking and Currency Committee."

Mr. Speaker, although more than 6 months have elapsed since I made my charges and requests for Federal and congressional investigations, and although additional evidence of political favoritism, windfalls, conflict of interest, fantastic profits and other questionable dealings has been uncovered, nothing has been done to clean the air which continues to get more and more polluted with each shameful disclosure of wrongdoing under this program.

In order words, Mr. Speaker, while the reek of scandal continues to seep out of this slum clearance program in New York City and while the stink grows stronger and stronger, the title I program in New York moves merrily along with complete disregard of the rights of the American taxpayers. This, to say the least, is shocking and disgraceful and must be stopped at once.

The people are entitled to all the facts and since the slum-clearance program is conducted with public funds—hard-earned tax dollars of our wage earners—the U.S. Government has a direct and prime interest in knowing what is going on, how the money is being spent and to whom the money is going.

The public is entitled to know what is wrong with the whole title I program. We have seen evidence of too many tenants on condemned sites getting kicked around instead of receiving relocation help; we have seen people getting pushed from one slum to a worse one; we have seen high-priced luxury housing going up instead of middle-income housing which title I was supposed to provide; we have seen where a member of the slum clearance committee had his bank finance sponsors in title I developments; we have seen prominent members of the underworld chosen as sponsors. In short, we have seen too much to be satisfied with mere explanations and excuses.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to understand how a Federal agency responsible for the proper administration of this title I program can close its eyes and do nothing to correct this deplorable situation in New York City. It is also hard to conceive that a congressional committee fully apprised of the many irregularities and scandals under this program would do nothing to straighten out this mess. All I can say is that our failure to take firm and definite action in this shocking problem has had the effect of granting the city of New York a license to whitewash the whole mess and sweep all the dirt and filth under its political rug.

Mr. Speaker, only an immediate top-to-bottom investigation of the multi-billion-dollar program will clear the foul air. The stench is too strong to ignore, even by this Congress. Only a congressional probe will unearth the many scandals and correct the tremendous abuses under this program. No amount of insults, abusive attacks and name calling from the supporters of the program will remove the need for a complete congressional investigation in order to restore public confidence in the title I program.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, we have a duty to the American people to look into every aspect of this whole title I program and we cannot shirk this responsibility.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I should like the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] for a moment. The paper and the radio this morning tell me there was no coalition between the southern Democrats and the Republicans on a labor bill last year. That was news. Is there a Member of the House who does not know the opposite is the fact? Now, this is the question I am asking. Is the administration—and I assume the gentleman from New York knows—in favor of the civil rights bill, so-called?

Mr. CELLER. If we may judge from the state of the Union message of the President delivered here the other day, I would say the President and the administration are in favor of the bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman. I also understood from the paper that our minority leader, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] will not sign the discharge petition, and the majority leader is somewhat of the same situation. I assume that is because they think the regular procedure of going through the committees of the House should be followed.

I do not intend to make a deal with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] because a deal is supposed to be a crooked thing and should not be made. But sometimes there may be a legitimate understanding between statesmen, even between some who are not recognized as statesmen.

Mr. CELLER. Why can you not make an honest deal?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In my opinion, I think you can, but as I understand, the committees of Congress are of the opinion that any deal is or may be crooked. There seems to be a sort of presumption along that line—the way they act sometimes. Is the gentleman honestly of the opinion that if I signed that petition—not today, because I do not want to be hasty, but some time later—he can and will help me out in getting my seniority rights protected?

Mr. CELLER. I shall always say a kind word for the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is the gentleman sure?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

CASTRO, TRUJILLO, AND TURMOIL

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, in the Saturday Evening Post for January 16, 1960, is an article by Daniel James entitled "Castro, Trujillo, and Turmoil." It deserves the attention of Members of Congress and, under unanimous consent, I am appending its full text to these remarks.

Fidel Castro, most observers agree—is not a Communist but a left-nationalist with a pronounced anti-American bias and the temper of an extremist. But whatever his political beliefs may be, he is pursuing policies inside Cuba as well as outside which serve the Communist cause.

However, as the author points out, he is still popular with his people although "some disenchantment has set in."

There are good as well as bad points about the government which replaced the Batista dictatorship, but I do not intend to set them forth in these remarks.

James writes:

Many Cubans cling to Castro fearing that the Dominican dictator may move in and impose a dictatorship under some former Batista chieftain like Gen. Jose Eleuterio Pedraza, who is even now training a force in the Dominican Republic to invade Cuba at the propitious moment. Trujillo is not only boss of 2,500,000 people of the Dominican Republic but the acknowledged leader of the forces of dictatorship in Latin America.

James says that "Trujillo is feared and hated not only by Cubans but by all his Caribbean neighbors," but that the tension in the Caribbean "that he did so much to foster is working against him." There is, he reports, much discontent among the Dominicans themselves.

"Must it be Castro or Trujillo in the Caribbean?" James says "No." There is a third alternative we hear too little about: Venezuela. In this country, where Dictator Perez Jiminez was ousted January 23, 1958, there is "rapid evolution, not revolution."

Its remarkable President, Romulo Betancourt, and his coworkers deserve great credit for the progress in Venezuela.

Mr. James concludes by recommending strongly that the 11th conference of the Organization of American States, originally scheduled for Quito, Ecuador, February 1 and then postponed, be held as soon as possible. The problems posed by Castro and Trujillo need action, he believes, through the establishment of a stronger Inter-American Peace Committee.

Castro and Trujillo are American problems in the broad, correct sense of the word "American." They are also American opportunities to promote the aims of the Organization of American States.

Americans, whether of the north, central or south portions of the hemisphere, are confronted with difficult problems in their relationships, and in connection with the survival of the free world. As with other problems, the best way to overcome them is to face them squarely.

It is encouraging to know that the President will visit South America in February. How wonderfully appropriate should he add to his schedule a visit to Caracas, Venezuela, where he can see for himself how a real democracy is evolving from a dictatorship.

The text of Mr. James' article follows:

CASTRO, TRUJILLO, AND TURMOIL

(By Daniel James)

Ever since the great American naval strategist Adm. Alfred Thayer Mahan felicitously called the Caribbean an "American Mediterranean" 62 years ago, our military defenders have heeded his teaching. Down the years, throughout the great arc of islands stretching from Florida to Venezuela, we have built up a long chain of naval, air and military bases—including missile-tracking stations—without which our shores would be vulnerable to attack.

Up till now the long chain of defenses, stretching across the world's second largest sea to Central and South America, seemed more than adequate.

But no longer. From Cuba to Panama, the sun-drenched Caribbean Sea is being churned into an unprecedented frenzy of revolution and riot, rivalry and intrigue. True, revolutions and riots and intrigues are not altogether new to this area of the world. But the situation today is something new. The chain of our defense never before has been cracked. But today such a crack has appeared.

The crack is in Cuba. The situation in Cuba today presents the gravest kind of threat to the United States because on that island we maintain our chief Caribbean naval base, at Guantanamo. For half a century Guantanamo has been the core of our Caribbean defense system. Its harbor can take our biggest warships and its airfield our biggest planes. From them we can patrol the great watery expanse where already Soviet submarines dare to prowl, as Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, Chief of Naval Operations, has revealed.

A treaty we signed with Cuba in 1934 gives us the right to use Guantanamo indefinitely, but now Cuban Premier Fidel Castro threatens to abrogate it. In an unprecedented speech before 1 million Cubans last October 26, Castro charged that we had sent planes to bombard Cuba. Castro then proceeded to whip up sentiment for our expulsion from Guantanamo. Alluding to our occupation of the base, Castro made the astonishing statement:

"How is it possible that in exchange for the risks we incur by the presence of that military base in our territory, the houses of our peasants, our sugar mills and our population are exposed to incendiary bombs and shrapnel from airplanes coming from North American territory?"

President Eisenhower stated the second day after the speech that he was puzzled by these charges, because the Cubans have traditionally been our friends. The State Department issued a long denial of the charges as preposterous. Mr. Eisenhower's puzzlement is shared by the whole American people. What has happened to the Cubans?

Last New Year's Day they celebrated the first anniversary of their successful revolution against the two-time dictator of Cuba, Gen. Fulgencio Batista. North Americans no less than Latin Americans greeted that revolution, led by the idealistic young Castro from the Sierra Maestra mountains, as a major step toward democracy. Yet today, 1 year later, Cuba appears as far from democracy as she was under Batista. Her economy is fast going downhill, her relations with the United States have been strained to the breaking point, and her leaders keep the whole Caribbean in an uproar. Most alarming of all, Cuba is permitting her revolution to be exploited by international communism.

For the past 6 months the Castro government has been conducting a feverish campaign against the United States. This campaign has become the center of Cuban policy. The campaign has mounted in intensity as Cuba's internal problems have grown painfully acute, and the conclusion is inescapable that the Americans—many of whom now know they were sadly in error when they greeted the Cuban revolution with optimistic pronouncements—are being made the scapegoat for Castro's failure to solve Cuba's problems. The revolution that was to have transformed Cuba into a prosperous democracy apparently itself has been transformed into an international conspiracy to defame a friendly neighbor.

Conspiracy is the word, for there is no doubt that behind the anti-American campaign there is the long arm of communism. Moscow and Peiping realize better than most Americans how vital the "American Mediterranean" is to our national interests. They have been making use of the Cuban revolution to throw the Caribbean into a turmoil and to turn the Caribbean peoples against us. While American leaders have been preoccupied with Berlin and Laos, the Kremlin and the Red Chinese have brought the cold war to our very doorstep.

In my opinion, based on months of careful reporting, Cuba has been converted into international communism's chief Caribbean base—a distinction formerly enjoyed by Red-dominated Guatemala. But the brain directing the operations of the Communist Caribbean conspiracy is located far behind this base. It functions in the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City. That Embassy, the writer is in a position to reveal, directs a swarm of agents who shuttle from Mexico to Cuba with clocklike regularity. Some of them are Russians, but the majority are of other nationalities: Chinese, Poles, Czechs, Cubans and other Latin Americans. They usually travel to Cuba as diplomats or businessmen.

One diplomat who frequently rides the Mexico-Cuba shuttle is a Czech accredited to the Communist Czechoslovakian Embassy in Mexico. This man was recently designated to act as commercial attaché to Cuba. Ostensibly interested in selling Czechoslovakian machinery in exchange for Cuban sugar, this attaché makes regular trips to Havana where he confers with Communist contacts. Another Iron Curtain "diplomat" in Mexico, who has suddenly been accredited to Cuba as a commercial attaché and thus has reason to travel there often, is a Pole, Leon Kolarski. What industrial products agrarian Poland could conceivably sell Cuba no one seems to know.

The Cuban Government is up to its neck in the Mexico-Cuba shuttle. Cuban officials who are dispatched to Mexico on special missions, or who live there, make it a point to confer with members of the Soviet Embassy including the Soviet Ambassador, Vladimir Bazikin.

An example was provided not long ago by a trusted aide of Castro, Capt. Armando Torres, who is the Cuban Premier's ace diplomatic trouble shooter and second in command of the Cuban army's G–2 section. Torres was sent to Mexico last September to represent Cuba at the anniversary of Mexico's independence celebration, his main function being to try to win over the critical Mexicans. On the morning after his arrival, Torres made a beeline for the Soviet Embassy.

The Cuban Ambassador to Mexico, Salvador Massip, is frequently in the company of Soviet Ambassador Bazikin—and this is not because their embassies happen to be near each other. The Soviet Embassy in Mexico supplies money as well as couriers and instructions to communism's Cuban base. Last spring this Embassy sent $200,000 to Cuba.

The Red Chinese are almost as active as the Russians in the Caribbean conspiracy. In Havana the writer met five Red Chinese journalists who had been touring the island to observe the Cuban revolution. Their real object was to organize cells inside Cuba's Chinese colony of 40,000 and to establish liaison with susceptible Cuban revolutionaries, including Castro's younger brother, Raúl, a dedicated Marxist, Defense Minister, and designated as successor to Castro in the event of Fidel's death.

Raúl Castro and other Cuban leaders well to the left assiduously foster the idea that China and revolutionary Cuba are comrades-in-arms. Thus Raúl, as chief of the Cuban armed forces at the time officially greeted the Red Chinese journalists in these words: "Mao Tse-tung is one of the figures most respected by Latin-American youth. Cuba and China have much in common. China had a Chiang Kai-shek and Cuba a Batista, and the enemies of both countries were aided by the same international reaction."

The Moscow-Peiping axis went to work in Cuba well in advance of Castro's anti-American campaign and prepared the ground for it. Last May, reports the Deputy Director of our Central Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. C. P. Cabell, USAF (retired), the Kremlin "sent under alias to Cuba a Soviet intelligence officer, Vadim Kotchergin, as a member of a Soviet trade-union delegation. His assignment was to give guidance to Cuban Communists." The same Kotchergin turned up again in Cuba last November as a fraternal delegate to the annual convention of the Cuban Confederation of Workers, accompanied this time by another agent, also a fraternal delegate.

It is a striking fact that during the months after Kotchergin's first trip to Cuba last May—June, July, and August—an unprecedented rash of invasions and revolutions broke out all over the Caribbean and precipitated the crisis that the area is experiencing now. It is equally striking that some of these upheavals were led by leftists friendly to the Communist bloc, if not members of it.

The Organization of American States investigated the first of the invasions—the one directed against Nicaragua on last May 31 and June 1—and turned up some extraordinary documents. It found a letter written on Cuban Government stationery which solicited from "the civil and military authorities" of Cuba, "every form of help and cooperation" for the invasion. The letter was signed by Maj. Ernesto (Ché) Guevara, as commander of the key Havana fortress, La Cabaña. This is the same violently anti-American Guevara who today is economic czar of Cuba as head of the national bank. Only last month he showed his hand by demanding that all business firms in Cuba take on and train Castro army officers in running the businesses.

Guevara and Castro's brother, Raúl, are the Cuban Premier's two most trusted confidants. Guevara is not only Cuba's economic czar, but he is a leader in revolutionary activities outside Cuba. He has been the chief planner of most of the invasions attempted during these last 8 months.

The way Guevara operates was revealed to the writer by Caribbean exiles who have had dealings with him. In one case a group of young Haitians who sought arms and money to overthrow their government were invited to Guevara's headquarters on the Isle of Pines. Haiti is a strategic pawn in Caribbean politics as it lies between Cuba and the Dominican Republic, whose dictator, Generalissimo Rafael Leonidas Trujillo, Castro has sworn to destroy. Guevara was therefore eager to help his Haitian visitors. But he insisted on one condition: they must not promote capitalism in their country. The Haitians rejected this condition, regarding it as outside dictation. So that invasion did not come off.

Guevara's favorite technique is to make invasions of other countries seem like native revolutions organized by exiles. But the exile groups he uses are invariably leftist fronts operating under his orders, though he himself has repeatedly stated he is not a Communist. The abortive Nicaraguan invasion was prepared by something called the Block of National Unity for the Liberation of Nicaragua, a Communist front based in Havana. The three invasions of the Dominican Republic last June, following the Nicaraguan affair, were all launched from Cuba by another front, the Dominican Liberation Movement.

If this Dominican Liberation Movement succeeds in overthrowing Trujillo, that will put the Dominican Republic under the domination of Castro. Formed in Havana last March, the Dominican Liberation Movement claims to be a coalition of Dominican exile groups, but other Dominican exile organizations charge that it is Red-controlled and will have nothing to do with it. The Dominican Popular Socialist (Communist) Party is an open member of the coalition.

Why is Castro permitting Cuba to be used as a base for Communist operations in the Caribbean? Is he himself a Communist or sympathizer?

It so happens that the aims of Castro and the Communists in the Caribbean coincide. Castro fancies himself the Simón Bolivar—the Liberator—of the Caribbean peoples. He is obsessed with the idea of destroying the old-line dictatorships, especially Trujillo's, and is willing to accept Communist aid to do so. The Communists, on the other hand, are eager to help Castro. They feel sure that, if the old regimes in the Caribbean fall, the governments replacing them will be anti-American and will challenge our right to maintain defense bases in the area.

Fidel Castro, most observers agree, is not a Communist but a left-nationalist with a pronounced anti-American bias and the temper of an extremist. But whatever his political beliefs may be, he is pursuing policies inside Cuba as well as outside which serve the Communist cause.

His attacks upon the United States externally are paralleled by a systematic campaign within Cuba to liquidate American interests there. Americans have a huge $850 million stake in Cuban commerce, industry, and agriculture. Castro is in the process of forcing them to give it up regardless of what that may cost the Cuban economy.

Thus although Cuba's income is derived largely from sugar, Castro is implementing a ruinous agrarian reform with the main objective the expropriation of the big, mostly American-owned sugar estates. Granted that Cuba is too dependent on sugar and her economy is unbalanced because of it, necessitating some sort of reform, expropriation of the industry can only cut her income drastically and cause unemployment. Equally unjustifiable is the expropriation of the big cattle ranches—one of the biggest, the 35,000-acre King Ranch, is American-owned—another major aim of the agrarian reforms. This not only reduces the country's income but also could result in a meat shortage.

Castro is flogging industry—Cuban as well as American—equally hard all along the line. An early revolutionary decree cut rents up to 50 percent in order to augment the purchasing power of some 800,000 tenants. But the main result has been to discourage new construction and spread unemployment. Then Castro sharply reduced electric and phone rates, also to aid the masses. This has made the American and Foreign Power Co., the chief electric utility, hold back on a $15 million expansion program and caused the International Telephone and Telegraph, which supplies phone service, to consider pulling out of Cuba. Most recently, Castro has slapped a 5 percent tax on mineral production and one of 25 percent on mineral exports, striking a blow at the $75 million Moa Bay Mining Co., an American firm which mines nickel and cobalt, and at other American mine operators in Cuba.

These assaults on industry have started a chain reaction which is seriously injuring all branches of the Cuban economy. No cruise ships will touch Havana this winter, and tourism is dead. New investment is practically nonexistent, while on the other hand unemployment has soared to an estimated 500,000—plus 200,000 underemployed—out of Cuba's 6 million population. Cuba's 1959 deficit is estimated at around $200 million, while her dollar reserves are at the dangerous low of perhaps $100 million. Where Castro will get the money to stave off bankruptcy in 1960 is anyone's guess.

Despite a year of endless blundering, the Cuban Premier is still popular with his people. Most Cubans believe in him because they have nothing else to believe in—they have been disillusioned so often that they cannot face another disillusionment. "Fidel gave us our only chance to make something of ourselves," a Havana housewife said, expressing the general attitude.

Nevertheless, some disenchantment has set in. The defection last October of Maj. Huberto Matos, the revolutionary leader who was regarded as just below the Castro brothers and Guevara in importance, may have been the turning point of the Cuban revolution. Since then, disaffection has been eating away at the regime's two chief bulwarks: the rebel army and the official 26th of July movement.

The way the trial of Major Matos was conducted intensified anti-Castro feeling. It was held in an army movie theater. Premier Castro was the principal witness for the prosecution, demanding death by firing squad for Matos. Castro strode to the stage, turned his back on the judges and lawyers seated thereon, and for 7 hours made a speech to the spectators and press in which he accused Matos of being a traitor. The court found Matos guilty of counterrevolutionary activities against Castro and sentenced him to 20 years' imprisonment.

As a result of such things as this, with the moderates in the Castro government growing more and more concerned at disaffections, the question being asked in Cuba is: "How long can Fidel last?"

How long depends on forces outside Cuba as well as inside, chief among them Trujillo. Many Cubans cling to Castro fearing that the Dominican dictator may move in and impose a dictatorship under some former Batista chieftain like Gen. José Eleuterio Pedraza, who is even now training a force in the Dominican Republic to invade Cuba at the propitious moment. Trujillo is not only boss of the 2,500,000 people of the Dominican Republic but the acknowledged leader of the forces of dictatorship in Latin America.

Trujillo is feared and hated not only by the Cubans but by all his Caribbean neighbors. If Castro seeks to become the Bolivar of the Caribbean, Trujillo's lifelong ambition has been to become its Napoleon. Since he came to power nearly 30 years ago he has more than once tried to overturn other Caribbean governments. Last summer he made an abortive attempt to unseat Castro via a fifth column inside Cuba, and he is constantly working to subvert Venezuela's revolutionary regime as well as Cuba's. Trujillo is thus as basic a cause of the Caribbean tension as Castro, and in that role antedates the Cuban revolutionary.

The Dominican dictator possesses the strongest and best trained armed forces in the Caribean. He is a power to be reckoned with. When he made himself dictator in 1930, the Dominican Republic, which the U.S. Marines had not long before vacated, was economically and politically bankrupt. Trujillo soon paid off the national debt, made the sugar industry profitable, encouraged foreign investment and built a reasonably stable economy. He also eradicated much disease, and his capital, Ciudad Trujillo, is one of Latin America's cleanest and most orderly.

But for his services Trujillo exacted a price from the Dominican people which history may judge exorbitant. He saddled them with a permanent reign of terror that renders life in the Dominican Republic uneasy, to put it mildly. He deprived them of many liberties, including the right to change jobs. He appointed himself czar of the economy, with power to decide who may own property or go into business. He shamelessly enriched himself and his family at the expense of the people. He operated, in short, a thoroughgoing police state for his own personal profit.

But Trujillo is not as secure as the trappings of his police state would make it appear. The tension in the Caribbean that he did so much to foster is working against him. It has frightened away investors, strained his budget through record expenditures for the armed forces, and produced something like an economic recession for the first time since he seized power. These and other factors, notably the example of Castro's overthrow of Batista, have aroused much discontent among the Dominicans; and Trujillo now has this new problem to face, as well as the pressure from without generated by Castro and Guevara. Some Caribbean observers are betting that, in this dilemma, the aging dictator may find it expedient to risk a diversionary adventure.

Must it be Castro or Trujillo in the Caribbean? During a 2-month tour of 10 Caribbean countries this reporter found that there is a third alternative to the 2 extremists, represented by a country we hear little about: Venezuela.

This month Venezuela, like Cuba, also will be celebrating the anniversary of a revolution against dictatorship. But there the resemblance ends. Since the Venezuelans ousted their dictator, Gen. Marcos Pérez Jiménez, on January 23, 1958, they have been moving toward a new kind of democracy in the Caribbean. While Castro, more than 1 year after his revolution, continues to find excuses for not holding the elections he promised during his fight against Batista, Venezuela held elections scarcely 10 months after Pérez Jiménez was overthrown. Today Venezuela has a democratically elected government headed by a veteran political leader, President Rómulo Betancourt. This government in contrast to Cuba's is not tearing the Venezuelan economy asunder but instead is planning its complete reconstruction over the next 5 years at a cost of $5 billion—the most ambitious program ever conceived in Latin America.

An army of experts, including three private American firms specializing in personnel and administration problems, is working under Betancourt's chief of planning, Dr. Manuel Pérez Guerrero, to complete the program by this spring. "The program," stressed Pérez Guerrero, "will be keynoted to rapid evolution, not revolution." Further explaining that its twin long-range objectives are to diversify and decentralize industry, and to effect a sound agricultural reform, he gave the writer a preview of the program which is released here for the first time.

Venezuela is at the mercy of a single product, oil, and of the fickle oil market. In 1958 oil accounted for 91 percent of her exports and, directly and indirectly, for nearly that much of her total revenue of about $1,500,000,000. Result: Most of the wealth derived from oil flows into the capital, Caracas, which has become a swollen metropolis of 1,500,000 souls squeezed into an 18,000-acre valley hemmed in by great mountains. The rest of Venezuela's 6,500,000 inhabitants are spread thin over 352,000 square miles outside the capital, and they live, for the most part, under primitive conditions. This imbalance makes the country susceptible to political extremism. Betancourt's program aims to alter this imbalance between Caracas and the provinces.

The program's boldest step forward calls for the creation of an industrial complex deep in the jungle region of Guiana, near the great Caroní River and the famed "mountain of iron," Cerro Bolívar. The Caroní, which flows into the Orinoco, is capable of providing 3 million kilowatts of electric energy, and a plant already built there by Betancourt is now producing an initial 300,000 kilowatts. The Cerro Bolívar, owned by United States Steel, claims an almost unlimited supply of iron, as it consists entirely of iron ore. Around these two resources the Government is building Venezuela's first steel mill, with a capacity of 600,000 tons, as a magnet to attract other industries.

"We want to stimulate private enterprise," says Dr. Raúl Leoni, president of the Venezuelan Senate and a close Betancourt associate.

The Government, accordingly, is encouraging new industries everywhere in an all-out attempt at diversification. Pillsbury Mills has formed a mixed American-Venezuelan corporation which is putting up a $3 million plant in Maracaibo to produce 200 tons of flour daily. Alcoa and the Italian industrial giant, Montecatini, are building a plant to make aluminum tubing. Container Corp. of America is erecting a factory to manufacture cardboard.

Some foreign businessmen question the Venezuelan Government's attitude toward foreign capital. One big American concern has circulated a confidential letter criticizing the key Minister of Mines and Hydrocarbons, Dr. Juan Pablo Pérez Alfonzo, because he is organizing a state-owned oil company which it fears may lead to nationalization. But the Minister declares unequivocally: "We have no desire or intention of nationalizing any properties owned by existing private companies, and expect to develop new fields on land owned by the state. We shall in no way compete with private industry."

The 5-year program's decentralization phase involves the creation of satellite towns around Caracas, to which industries will be moved. Three satellites are going up within a 25-mile radius of the capital and others are planned. To link satellites and capital, Betancourt is spending $200 million to build new roads and repair old ones.

Venezuela's agrarian reform is, unlike Cuba's, moderate. Instead of rushing into the expropriation of big land holdings just because they are big, the Venezuelans will expropriate only lands that are idle and uncultivated, regardless of whether they are large or small. The central aim of the reform is to bring more land under cultivation, not to punish bigness. Unproductive lands will be distributed among the 80 percent of Venezuela's peasantry who are landless and among 20,000 Caracas unemployed, who will be settled in the countryside. Furthermore, the distributed land will belong to its new owners unconditionally and in perpetuity, whereas in Cuba it can revert to the state. There will be no communal ownership.

The Venezuelan Communist Party is furiously opposed to Betancourt's agrarian reform, as it is to his whole economic program, on the ground that it is too moderate. Although the Venezuelan Communist Party is far stronger than its Cuban counterpart, Betancourt is no Castro to yield to Red pressure. He defiantly "thumbs his nose" at the Communists, As he declared in his inauguration speech in February 1958, "The Communist philosophy does not accord with the democratic structure of the Venezuelan state." And so the nearly 50,000-strong Communist Party and its 100,000 sympathizers are excluded from the government.

Betancourt has more cause to traffic with the Communists and dislike the United States than Castro. He began his political career more than three decades ago as a Communist who hated the American oil companies. He blamed the United States for backing a military coup which overthrew the democratic regime of novelist Rómulo Gallegos, who had succeeded him in power—Betancourt had been provisional President—in 1948. During a subsequent exile which lasted nearly 10 years, Betancourt talked and wrote against the United States and threatened to nationalize oil.

But today this ex-Communist proudly claims, "Nelson Rockefeller is one of my best friends," displays cordiality toward the United States, and is not gunning for the oil companies. What accounts for his transformation?

The answer is, Two men: ex-President José Figueres of Costa Rica, and Gov. Luis Muñoz-Marín of Puerto Rico. Betancourt spent most of his exile as the guest of those two leaders, and they persuaded him that he could put Venezuela on the path of true political and economic progress without the Communists—and without becoming a "tool of Yankee imperialism." Betancourt watched how Figueres, as Costa Rica's President, negotiated a pact with the giant United Fruit Co. (instead of expropriating it), which put money into the national treasury and set a pattern for all Central America. And he saw how Muñoz-Marín, through his world-famed Operation Bootstrap, attracted U.S. industry to Puerto Rico and within a mere decade transformed it from an impoverished and corruption-ridden island into a thriving democracy. These deeds convinced Betancourt that the Figueres-Muñoz-Marín road was best for Venezuela, and that country is now demonstrating that the "third alternative" to Castro and Trujillo is best for the Caribbean.

Will the Caribbean adopt the Venezuelan way? It may, if some means is found first to make the Caribbean caldron simmer down and give Venezuela a chance to prove itself. Peace, in short, is what is needed at present. Is peace in the Caribbean possible?

This question may be answered to some extent when the 11th conference of the Organization of American States is held—if, indeed, it is held this year. It originally was scheduled to be held at Quito, Ecuador, on February 1. Then last December 18 Ecuador suddenly asked that the conference be postponed indefinitely. Various reasons were given for the postponement, including the statement that the Legislative Palace and hotel being built to accommodate the conference would not be completed in time. Officials of other countries called these and other reasons for postponement neither serious nor real.

We and some other member nations want to hold the conference as soon as possible to press for a much stronger Inter-American Peace Committee, with the power and authority to act whenever any member nation is threatened. The fight for such action is sure to produce plenty of fireworks. Cuba, because of Castro's plans for liquidating Trujillo, will oppose the move bitterly.

The longer the conference is postponed, the fewer the chances of empowering an Inter-American Peace Committee with real authority. If such a powerful committee is established then there is some hope for peace in the Caribbean. But if the conference is long postponed or if Castro should prevail at such a conference, it is certain that things will get a lot worse before they get better—worse for the peoples of the Caribbean and worse for us as well.

THE PANAMA CANAL: SYMBOL OF A FOURTH FRONT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 2 hours.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include certain documents and pertinent material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, on the morning of November 4, 1959, the people of the United States were surprised to read press dispatches from Panama about Canal Zone border violence on the previous day under large headlines, such as, "U.S. Troops Guard Canal Zone Against Mob." This news was not surprising to those in close touch with isthmian developments.

As a Representative in the Congress from the great State of Pennsylvania and a member of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations charged with the formulation of supply bills for the Department of Defense, the Department of Commerce, and related agencies, the discharge of such duties has caused me to become a close student of Panama Canal problems. These questions include those relating to increase of transit capacity and improvement of operations of the canal, also matters relating to the sovereign control of the Canal Zone.

Even though my studies made it possible to foresee the disorders that occurred on November 3, 1959, and to warn proper authorities of the executive departments as well as the Congress far in advance, it is indeed a sterile satisfaction to state that those grave disturbances occurred precisely on the day as predicted; precisely in the manner prophesied; and precisely with the results expected. It would have been far better had timely action by the Congress or Executive been taken to prevent this distressing incident from occurring.

Unfortunately, the events of that tragic day and the long series of developments leading to them have not been adequately presented by our mass media to the people of this Nation—a failure that has the savor of a conspiracy of silence. Because they are fundamental and transcend all lesser considerations, their adequate clarification is imperative and requires some reiteration and frank speaking.

In so doing, I wish to emphasize that I am not an enemy of Panama, nor of any just aspirations of its people, among whom I have made numerous and treasured friendships extending back many years. I sincerely trust that what I say today will add to public knowledge in both Panama and the United States, and lead to better understanding of the issues involved. To this task, I now direct myself with the special request not to be interrupted until the end of my address.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Knowing the purpose for which the gentleman asks me to yield, I am glad to yield.

Mr. BONNER. Anticipating the situation, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, the Honorable Christian Herter, on January 6, 1960, pointing out that certain situations existed in the Panama Zone that were the cause of great concern to me.

I asked what the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the legislative committee having jurisdiction over the Panama Canal and other isthmian canals might do to assist the Department of State and I asked for a report from the Department of State as to whether or not we have a firm policy on this subject. I also pointed out that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has a special subcommittee of five of the most outstanding engineers in America studying the Panama Canal, and studying the feasibility of its improvement and whether or not there might be a new or alternate canal constructed in some other part of the isthmus.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that this letter to the Secretary of State be included in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D.C., January 6, 1960.

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
The Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As I am sure you are aware, developments in worldwide commerce in recent years have made it apparent that the Panama Canal, in its present state, will soon be incapable of handling the increasing demands of traffic. While the general problem has been recognized for some time it has become accentuated not only by the unprecedented numbers of ships transiting the canal in the postwar period, but by the growing trend toward larger and larger ships in the bulk trades. The huge, new super-ore-carriers and combination oil and ore carriers which require special traffic control within the canal area lend emphasis to the situation. According to our best information, the next decade would be critical unless ways and means are found and put into effect to increase traffic-handling ability.

In recognition of the foregoing, our committee has called upon a distinguished group of technical and economic consultants to study the operations of the existing canal, to review previously proposed alternatives, and to evolve plans for adequate isthmian transit facilities to meet reasonably anticipated needs for the future. The alternatives being considered involve either complete reconstruction of the present canal or construction of a sea level canal on the present site or elsewhere in Central America. The Panama Canal Company, viewing the same problems, has prepared plans for modernization of existing facilities and procedures to assure prompt transits for the future.

On the basis of studies made by our own board of consultants, as well as those made by the Panama Canal Company, it appears that in order to insure continued efficient functioning of the canal and keep it abreast of currently growing traffic requirements, the expenditure of some $60 million for modernization will be required. To meet long-range needs, it is conservative to state that minimum requirements will equal or exceed the original construction cost of the present canal.

This country has, of course, a great stake in the Panama Canal as an investment, a crucial defense asset, and as a facility of inestimable importance to our commercial and economic well-being. Accordingly, in the light of our knowledge as to impending need for expenditures of very large sums for modernization of trans-isthmian transit facilities, this committee is greatly concerned over the present unrest and continued pressure by the Republic of Panama for privileges and concessions not included in or contemplated by the orginal treaty. In other words, serious questions have been raised regarding the justification for the expenditure of large sums in an area which appears to be, at present at least, extremely unstable.

In order to assist the committee in its studies of this vitally important subject, I would appreciate it very much if you would submit to me your views concerning our international policy, if any, in dealing with the demands of the Republic of Panama with respect to concessions not included in the original treaty covering cession of sovereignty rights over the Canal Zone and the construction and maintenance of the Panama Canal. If there is no such policy, we would welcome your views with respect to justification for future expenditures of the magnitude indicated herein in the light of presently apparent trends toward restriction of United States right and privileges in the Canal Zone.

With kindest personal regards and every good wish.

Sincerely,

HERBERT C. BONNER,
Chairman.

Mr. FLOOD. I am delighted that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER], chairman of the great Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which has legislative jurisdiction over the Panama Canal has written that letter. I hope the committee will proceed with hearings. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this week the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN], chairman of the Subcommittee on Central and South America of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, has been conducting hearings. I was invited to appear and did appear for several hours yesterday before that committee.

JURIDICAL BASE OF U.S. ISTHMIAN CANAL POLICY

The foundations of our Isthmian Canal policies are rooted in four centuries of history and rest upon three important canal treaties:

First. The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 between Great Britain and the United States, which facilitated construction of the Panama Canal. In this agreement, Great Britain relinquished its own rights for construction and control of an Isthmian Canal and recognized the exclusive rights of the United States thereto. The United States, in assuming this obligation, adopted the main points of the Convention of Constantinople of 1888 for the operation of the Suez Canal as the rules to govern the operation and management of the American canal. These provide that the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality with tolls that are just and equitable. It also provides for the United States to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Second. The Hay - Bunau - Varilla Treaty of November 18, 1903, between the Republic of Panama and the United States. On the part of Panama, this convention granted to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of the the Canal Zone for the construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection, and, most significantly, as if the United States were the sovereign of the territory and to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority. On the part of the United States, the main points for the purpose of this address were that it guaranteed the independence of Panama, which had just seceded from Colombia and whose existence depended on the protection of the United States and the success of the canal undertaking. The United States also was authorized to enforce sanitary ordinances and to maintain public order in the terminal cities of Panama and Colon and in the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in event of failure of the Republic of Panama to do so, as well as to acquire property within these cities and adjacent areas for canal purposes through the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

Third. The Thomson-Urritia Treaty of April 6, 1914, proclaimed March 30, 1922, between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, the sovereign of the isthmus prior to the Panama revolution of November 3, 1903. This treaty aimed at removal of all misunderstandings growing out of the political events in Panama in November 1903, restoration of the cordial friendship that had previously existed between Colombia and the United States, and definitions and regulation of their rights and interests with respect to the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad.

The negotiations of these three treaties were the contributions of some of the ablest men of their times. They knew the history of the Isthmus as a land of endemic revolution and political instability. They understood the lessons of the Suez Canal, and benefited by them in adopting policies for administering the Panama Canal. They knew the difficulties experienced in the negotiations with Colombia for a satisfactory canal treaty, which was finally rejected by the Senate of that country, and thereupon determined to solve permanently the problem of sovereignty in the Canal Zone.

With duality of control as originally proposed in the rejected Hay-Herran Treaty removed, the framers of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty were justified in feeling that what would have been a perpetual cause of conflict and recrimination, which always accompanies extra-territorial rights, had been eliminated forever.

The Canal Zone is a constitutionally acquired domain of the United States. Under our Constitution, the treaties and statutes that relate to its acquisition, the subsequent construction of the Panama Canal, and its perpetual operation, are "supreme law of the land." Moreover, the framers of the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty were far visioned. They discriminated between the "grant" of the Canal Zone "in perpetuity" and the "life of this convention," which they realized would probably be modified. They even provided against the possibility of Panama entering "any union or confederation of states, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence," in which case the treaty provides that "the rights of the United States shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired."

CANAL ZONE: U.S. GOVERNMENT RESERVATION

Despite the clear wording of the Panama Canal treaties, so many misconceptions of their key features have characterized press coverage in recent years, even including some of the most respected encyclopedias, that clarifications are essential. In this, the first fact of importance to note is that the original recommendation to secure control of the Canal Zone "in perpetuity" was made by the Isthmian Canal Commission in early 1902. This was followed by the Spooner Act, approved June 28, 1902, authorizing the President to secure by means of a treaty the "perpetual control" of the Canal Zone for the construction and "perpetual" maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the Panama Canal.

It is true that the preamble of the 1903 treaty acquiring the Canal Zone describes the "sovereignty of such territory as being actually vested in the Republic of Panama." This description was used, however, to show the transfer of sovereignty over the area from Colombia to Panama as the result of the secession of Panama from Colombia and thereby to show the authority of Panama to cede to the United States that jurisdiction for canal purposes. Certainly it was not used for the purpose of establishing the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone after its occupation in 1904 by the United States.

The fact that U.S. sovereignty over the Zone is absolute was clearly indicated by Bunau-Varilla, Panama's Minister to the United States and one of the principal draftsmen of the 1903 treaty who stated:

After mature thought, I recognized that if I enumerated in succession the various attributes of sovereignty granted, I ran the risk of seeing in the (U.S.) Senate, some other attributes asked for.

To cut short any possible debate I decided to grant a concession of sovereignty en bloc.

The formula which seemed to me the best one was to grant to the United States in the Canal Zone "all the rights, power, and authority which the United State would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory; to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power and authority."

Thus, it is definitely established that the Canal Zone was not sold, ceded, or leased, but granted in perpetuity to the United States for perpetual operation of the Panama Canal. Not only that, all privately owned properties in the Canal Zone were bought by the United States, and these included the Panama Railroad.

In addition to the titles thus secured, Colombia, in the Thomson-Urritia Treaty, recognized the title to both the Panama Canal and Panama Railroad as "vested entirely and absolutely" in the United States "without any encumbrances or indemnities whatever."

Moreover, President Taft, by Executive Order of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the 1903 treaty of the Panama Canal Act of Congress, declared that all land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone are necessary to the construction, maintenance, operation, protection, and sanitation of the Panama Canal, and the sovereignty of the United States of America.

Nobody had more to do, including the great Teddy Roosevelt, with the Panama Canal, or longer to do with it, than President Taft. All these points, Mr. Speaker, and many others could be stated remove all doubt as to the sovereign control of the entire Canal Zone.

Its status is that of a U.S. Government reservation, with a full, entire, and exclusive sovereign control vested in the United States of America. And, Mr. Speaker, since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, the only authorized symbol among nations of the world of sovereignty and of such absolute authority is the flag of that nation. In this case sovereignty in the Canal Zone is exhibited and displayed and can only be exhibited and displayed by flying the flag of the United States of America.

The Government of the Republic of Panama states that between the exclusion and ratification of the treaty and the opening of the canal—and this is from the language of the Government of Panama, February 26, 1904—these were the languages and the exchange of the ratification between sovereign states—Panama declared its jurisdiction ceased over the zone.

Moreover, President Taft, by Executive order of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the 1903 treaty and the Panama Canal Act, declared that "all land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone are necessary for the construction, maintenance, operation, protection, and sanitation of the Panama Canal."

All these points, Mr. Speaker, and many others that could be stated, remove all doubt as to the sovereign control of the entire Canal Zone. Its status is that of a U.S. Government reservation with full and exclusive sovereign control vested in the United States. The only authorized symbol of such absolute authority is the flag of the United States.

SECRETARIES HAY, TAFT, AND HUGHES: CANAL ZONE SOVEREIGNTY VIEWS

The current agitation about the sovereign control of the Canal Zone is not a new issue but an old one periodically dragged out of its tomb for political purposes. Notwithstanding the fact that this subject has been repeatedly clarified, recent references to Panama as the "titular sovereign" of the Canal Zone, or whatever that is, by high officials of our State Department and others, cannot be dismissed as effusions of the ignorant, for they have been presented as reaffirmations of the views enunciated in 1906 by Secretary William Howard Taft. What are some of the key facts in the history of this matter?

Secretary of Government Tomas Arias of Panama, one of the revolutionary junta of 1903, in a note dated May 25, 1904, addressed to Gov. George W. Davis of the Canal Zone stated:

> The Government of the Republic of Panama considers that upon the exchange of ratifications of the treaty for opening the interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Panama, its jurisdiction ceased over the Zone.

Ratifications of this treaty, it may be stated, were exchanged on February 26, 1904.

In spite of this clear, unequivocal declaration, Secretary Arias later presented the sovereignty question to the United States. In a comprehensive reply to the Panamanian Government on October 24, 1904, Secretary of State Hay asserted that "the great object to be accomplished by the treaty is to enable the United States to construct the canal by the expenditure of public funds of the United States—funds created by the collection of taxes" and that "the position of the United States is that the words 'for construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and the protection of the said canal' were not intended as a limitation on the grant, but are a declaration of the inducement prompting the Republic of Panama to make the grant" of the Canal Zone to the United States in perpetuity.

What more do you need?

Now, Mr. Speaker, there have been a series of statements by Secretary Taft, when he was Secretary of War, and when he was President of the United States, and by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt when he was President of the United States, by President Hayes, by General Grant when he was ex-President of the United States, by Mr. Hay, and a long series of Secretaries, establishing what I have just presented. It is incomprehensive to me that the Secretary of State of the United States today would write me a letter saying for 50 years the United States has recognized titular sovereignty, whatever in the world that is, to Panama. And, these people have tortured—tortured, I say—and taken completely and entirely out of context—a matter which is disgraceful—the words of great Presidents, great American Cabinet members, great Secretaries of State, for reasons that I cannot understand, to say there is a titular sovereignty, if that makes you feel better, in Panama. What is that? Throwing pearls to swine. That is not the forthright way to deal with a sister sovereign state whose people have been friends for generations.

And, may I add, Mr. Speaker, there is a series of decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States establishing this position and brushing aside as the merest technicality or obiter dicta technical language contrary to the position I am establishing.

Mr. Hughes states:

> It was an absolute futility for the Panamanian Government to expect any administration, no matter what it was, any President, or any Secretary of State, at any time, ever to surrender any part of these rights which the United States had acquired under the treaty of 1903.

Shades of Teddy Roosevelt, shades of William Taft, shades of Charles Evans Hughes, who, in their hearts, believed that no administration of any party, no President, no Secretary of State, any time, any place, anywhere, for any reason, would surrender any part of our sovereignty.

But, ah. Well, we are trying to. This Congress will not permit it.

Now, in view of the facts, Mr. Speaker, the best case—and as a trial lawyer I like to say it this way—the best case that can be made for Panama's claim of sovereignty over the Canal Zone is that of a reversionary character. In the sole event that the United States should cease to maintain and operate the canal, should that ever occur, the United States of America undoubtedly would offer no objection to reassumption by Panama of her sovereign control of the Canal Zone, if that is what she wishes. Meanwhile, to encourage Panamanians, our friends and our neighbors, to think that the beau geste of titular sovereignty is something that it absolutely is not is lacking in fair dealing and is contrary to the best interests not only of Panama but of the United States of America.

DIPLOMATIC DIKE IS BROKEN

The completion of the Panama Canal within the cost and time estimates, its successful maintenance and its operation every minute under the treaty since the opening to traffic in 1914 form one of the most brilliant chapters in the history of the United States. Former President Theodore Roosevelt always considered that this was of importance comparable to the Louisiana Purchase. He and other great statesmen who contributed to the success of the enterprise had every reason to be proud of their achievement.

For many years this project went ahead on the force of its initial impetus. The giants of the early years gradually passed from the scene and the conduct of our isthmian policies fell into much less capable hands. Even so it required the impact of the great depression of 1929–32 and the Cuban revolution—mirabile dictu—this time in 1933, to start a chain of events at Panama that are still in motion.

In this connection it should be recalled that until the abrogation of the Platt Amendment of the Cuban Constitution, by treaty on May 31, 1934, following a period of great violence in Cuba, the United States of America up until that day had the right to intervene for the "preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty.

It was after this policy of abandonment in Cuba that the Hull-Alfaro Treaty in 1936 between Panama and the United States was negotiated. Here is where the erosion begins. Here is the beginning of the end unless this Congress speaks.

In the first article it abrogated Article I of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, by which the United States had undertaken to guarantee and maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama, a provision included in the Panama Constitution and known to Panamanians as the Platt Amendment of Panama. Regardless of what was done, which I deplore, it was done properly, it was done constitutionally, it was done by amendment and ratification and exchange and deposit of ratifications between sovereign states and approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate of the United States. So whether you like what they did or not they at least did it constitutionally.

Now, they invoked the guarantee of the United States to maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama and a provision was put in the Panama Constitution, known by the Panamanians as the Platt Amendment of Panama. This treaty was the first breach in the juridical foundation for the Panama Canal enterprise.

Other surrenders in the 1936 treaty include loss on the part of the United States of important sovereign powers and rights affecting the Panama Canal, especially that of eminent domain within the Republic of Panama, all without adequate compensation to the United States, which had borne all costs of construction, sanitation, and defense. But the erosion did not stop there.

After prolonged secret negotiations started in 1953 the process was further advanced in the Eisenhower-Remon Treaty of 1955. While in nowise abridging the sovereign authority of the United States over the Canal Zone and Panama Canal granted in articles II and III of the 1903 treaty, the 1955 treaty went much further in its surrenders than the 1936 treaty.

The 1955 treaty in the Senate of the United States had practically no debate at all. I doubt if most of you in the House have even heard about it.

Anyhow, it gave away additional rights and properties of the United States and increased the Canal annuity from $430,000 allowed in the 1936 treaty to $1,930,000. Do not delude yourself, Mr. Speaker, that one dime of that increase from $430,000 to $1,930,000 ever went to raise the standard of living of one little Panamanian Indian or citizen. It went to the members of 20 great aristocratic families in Panama. Do not be deluded—not a dime.

Among its most remarkable features was the surrender to Panama—this you will not believe—without any proper investigation, with no authorization by or consulting with the Congress, of the valuable railroad properties in the cities of Panama and Colon, including the designed terminal freight yards and the passenger stations in those cities, valued at $24 million. Not only that, but the 1955 treaty even contemplated the abandonment of the railroad itself.

Do you know how that was stopped? I had a hand in that. A general of the Corps of Engineers who had been Governor of the zone was testifying before the Subcommittee on Appropriations on the Panama Canal. In justifying a line item of his budget before that subcommittee he talked about trucks, saying they needed so many trucks. Out of a clear blue sky, for no reason at all, I said to him, "What do you want so many trucks for?" "Oh," he said, "didn't you know? We are going to abandon the railroad." "Oh," I said, "is that so? Well, I have news for you. You are not going to abandon the railroad."

The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PRESTON], on my request referred this matter to the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER]. They sent a special subcommittee to the Canal Zone and held extensive hearings. I was invited to appear before that subcommittee and cross-examined this great general. The sum total of the whole thing is that the Congress of the United States prevented them from giving away the railroad, but do you know what happened? While we in the House were saving the railroad, which we did, the Senate gave away the terminal yards and stations. Now you have a railroad but "You ain't got no terminals," unless you buy them back for probably $50 million now from the Republic of Panama. You would not believe that, would you? But that is what happened.

The overall results of our sustained surrenders at Panama have been the withdrawal of U.S. activities to the Canal Zone and a series of abandonments in the zones. The costs involved will have to be borne by American taxpayers and the interoceanic traffic paying tolls, but even more important, we have been giving away all of our bargaining power with the Republic of Panama.

Mark this as well, the results of these diplomatic failures are not accidental. These things are part of a well calculated plan. This was revealed by Ambassador Ricardo M. Arias of Panama, Dicky Arias, in a major political address on April 29, 1958. Where? Here in Washington. Would you believe that? I am going to read you the language spoken by an ambassador of a foreign state in your Nation's Capital at the Foreign Service School of Georgetown University on that day—replete with hostile propaganda against the United States—an ambassador. Now listen to this. I quote:

> The foreign policy of my country during the last 50 years has been to exert every effort in order to obtain at least for Panama conditions similar to those granted by the United States to Colombia in 1903.

Do you know what that means?

This pronouncement of Panamanian policy, Mr. Speaker, should not be taken lightly but as a serious warning. Its objectives are rescission of the perpetuity and sovereignty provisions of the 1903 treaty, early establishment of dual sovereignty over the Canal Zone, and finally nationalization of the Panama Canal. It is no wonder that many North Americans have become concerned about the Panama Canal and wish to know how the present turmoil and uncertainty were ever allowed to develop.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE NOT AN OCCUPIED TERRITORY

The era of great American giveaways began at Panama with the 1936 treaty already mentioned.

World War II commenced in September 1939, which was shortly after the 1936 treaty was finally ratified by the U.S. Senate. In preparation for possible involvement, the United States had to obtain sites for defense installations in the Republic of Panama, all necessary for protection of the Panama Canal. Because of the loss of the right of eminent domain in the Republic of Panama, the United States was denied that method for securing bases and had to obtain them through diplomatic channels amidst mounting difficulties and exorbitant demands for rentals. It was not until May 18, 1942, that a defense sites agreement was at last signed.

After the war, anti-American clamor erupted, with unanimous demand by the Panama National Assembly for evacuation of all sites. The President of Panama was quoted as demanding that the 1936 treaty be made "more effective in terms of benefits for Panama." All of this agitation led to negotiations between Panama and the United States for a defense base treaty.

On December 9, 1947, Foreign Minister Ricardo J. Alfaro of Panama resigned in protest against his Government's agreeing to extend the leases on the most important bases still held by the United States.

Now, Members of the House, Mr. Speaker, here is the way to run a place. Listen to this:

Following this lead of the Foreign Minister, the National Assembly of Panama was surrounded by thousands and thousands of anti-American mobs. They threatened to lynch any Member of the Assembly voting to lease bases to the United States. What do you think the Panama Assemblymen did? They went along with the mob. They unanimously rejected the treaty. Government, foreign policy by mob rule, repeated on November 3, November 28, 1959; the same town, the same place; a slight change in the cast of characters, due to time; nothing else.

The United States had no recourse except to evacuate all bases. Many Panamanians, I assure you, deplored that action of its Congress.

Now, it was in the course of these very negotiations that I have just mentioned in Panama that a more threatening event occurred. Where? Right here in Washington. In November 1946, the State Department, following a vicious Soviet-Russian attack in the United Nations against the United States—this was one of the first and most violent Soviet attacks in the United Nations against the United States, while negotiations were going on in Panama, Soviet Russia charged that the American defense bases around the world were evidences of aggression, and do you know what the State Department did? You will not be surprised, but I will just say it out loud. They sent to the United Nations a report of American bases throughout the world, and do you know what they listed the Panama Canal Zone as? United States Occupied Territory. Do you believe that? Is there any wonder that our own State Department classed one of the most vitally important constitutionally acquired domains as "occupied territory," and that we should have trouble in this year of our Lord 1960 in defending the legal status of the Zone as a grant of sovereignty in perpetuity? Of course not.

Now, a few facts of juridical history. Oh, listen to this. Watch the left hook in this one; literally and figuratively. If this is all true, if you will act on a juridical treaty this way, then it would be just as logical, because the circumstances are identical and on all fours, to list Alaska as "occupied territory."

Mr. Speaker, certainly there could be no turning back of the clock of history. Do you think it will not come based upon this precedent that Soviet Russia will not attack your treaty of purchase of Alaska just because you made a mistake? You think she will not? Here is her precedent. She set it up; she set it up.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. EDMONDSON. What kind of precedent should this afford on the question of the lands we have acquired from Indian tribes by treaty?

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Oklahoma, of course, is my pet authority on that. It is a rhetorical question. Now, you answer that yourself; you should know.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Does the gentleman agree with me that it might lead on to the further conclusion that we should return to these Indian tribes the lands we now occupy as States because we acquired them by treaty?

Mr. FLOOD. Juridically you have a treaty with an Indian tribe which they entered into as a sovereign power. That is the law and your answer, Q.E.D. Yes, but Russia, even I say, was not worried about your little old Indian tribes. But she is worrying since an American whose body lies buried in the walls of the Kremlin, who led the American Communist Party at the time of the great Bolshevik revolution, who in 1917, at the time of their first conquest proposed the importance of taking the Canal from the United States. When the Communists were tossed out of Franco Spain the Communists in Spain came to Latin America, to the Caribbean, to Panama.

The minute Nasser took the Suez Canal, in 2 weeks' time, Panamanian officials were in Cairo; 2 weeks after that Egyptian engineers and financiers were in Panama City, and they have been meeting back and forth ever since.

Fly the flag of Panama, will you? Oh! It is just a gesture to keep those funny little people happy. It does not mean anything? So is your old man! They know what it means, and I know, and I know that in your heart you know.

Despite the generous treatment afforded Panama in the 1955 treaty already discussed, events having a great impact on the isthmus did not stop. On July 21–22, 1956, Presidents of the American nations met at Panama City in the Republic of Panama, attracting world attention to great canal project on which the economic well-being of Panama largely depends. While public interest was thus focused toward the West, events of far greater significance were in making in the Near East.

Four days later, on July 26, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal. Officially indorsed by the Government of Panama, this seizure of the Suez Canal started a chain of events affecting the Panama Canal, which accelerated trends already evident. Nationalization thus became the battle cry of radical elements in Panama, especially by students at the Panama University, where, backed by Communist influence, they proudly displayed a large sign: "The canal is ours."

Foreseeing the pending dangers and realizing the imperative need for a congressional reaffirmation on our isthmian canal policy, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 205, 85th Congress, on June 27, 1957. In the light of subsequent developments, it is indeed unfortunate that no action was taken on it. This failure was interpreted on the isthmus as lack of leadership and psychological weakness. It served to encourage radical agitators to continue on their course.

The next step in the erosion is a carefully organized raid. Oh, now, the fangs are beginning to show.

There is no more talk. Let us go and take it. This is a sop for Communist operations. Now we get the activists in a carefully organized raid into your Canal Zone on May 2, 1958. What did the Panamanians call it? What name did they give to this? Operation sovereignty. Do you think they are kidding? They do not.

These are students and, boy, you will be surprised how old looking, as Vice President NIXON said, how awfully old looking, these South American students are. You know what I mean. You take a course in flower designing, 1 hour a week, and you are a member of the student body for 100 years.

They planted 72 Panamanian flags in places of prominence, including a big one right smack in front of the United States of America Canal Zone Administration Building. They raised the flag. You did not even know what was going on. There were little quips, little lines in the paper, not much more.

This was an eventuality I had foreseen. I had brought this very detail to the attention of the executive department and all the proper officials in Washington. I told them exactly what was going to happen, the day it was going to happen, where it was going to happen, what flags they would use, the size of the flags, where they would be set up. Everybody thought it was a great big joke. They said that FLOOD must be drinking again and, you know, I have not had a drink in 30 years. What a joke, some little funny people having fun, a schoolboy prank, exuberant students, about 50 years old apiece.

Though this highly provocative incident was witnessed by all Canal Zone authorities and by U.S. officials, the trespassers were not interfered with by the Canal Zone police. Nobody said or did a thing. They were allowed to leave the zone without obstruction. The Canal Zone police went around, picked up all the Panamanian flags, carried them back down to the border and gave them back to the nice little college boys.

This 1958 flag-planting Communist mob invaded the Canal Zone, constitutional sovereign territory of the United States, an extension of your coastline. Well, the schoolboy angle was the official Department of State and Canal Zone Government explanation.

This received the most extensive coverage in the papers in all of Asia, all of Europe, also every paper in Central and South America gave it great publicity. The Soviet press made a murder case out of this. What did this do? This emboldened the agitators to more mob violence.

Let me tell you it is significant it was this very same week and month that the Vice President of the United States, Mr. NIXON and his lovely lady, during the latter part of his visit of good will to Latin America, were subjected to the grossest forms of indignity, also perpetrated by students of Peruvian and Venezuelan universities, with the ruthless skill of the trained leadership and the characteristic Red pattern of the graduates of the school at Prague where, by the way, Castro's kid brother graduated before he went to Russia. Nice crowd, these students.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHERER. I want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his excellent presentation and on alerting the Congress and the American people to this perilous situation that exists in Panama today. I want to ask the gentleman just one question, if it is not his opinion, from his long study of the controversy that he has been describing in the Canal Zone, that as long as we continue, as we have in the past, to grant concession after concession to the Panamanian politicians, these demands are going to continue and continue until there is an internationalization of the Canal Zone irrespective of what we do?

Mr. FLOOD. I have tried for 2 hours to say that, and the gentleman has said it in 30 seconds better than I could ever say it. Of course, that is it. That is it. Of course, I am no politician. I am a statesman myself, you understand. A statesman is a washed-up politician. But, you are right. My friend is right. This current mess is nothing as of today, after a long chain of causation. The proximate cause is what you said. But, the immediate parenthetical cause, the impetus of today, is the effort of a discredited Panamanian demagog and politician, the former Foreign Minister Aquilino Boyd, who had no more chance of being elected President of Panama than your grandmother, until he found this pigeon. Now he is a 10-to-1 bet to win in 90 days. He led the invasion. He carried the Panamanian flag into the Canal Zone.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FLYNN. I want very, very much to commend the gentleman for his almost single-handed defense of one of the greatest assets that this country has, not only now, but over a long period of time. I visited Panama within the past few weeks. I was there when the disturbances were going on. I saw firsthand automobiles turned upside down and burned by the mob that invaded the Isthmus of Panama. I saw the damage caused to the railroad. I saw the barricades in the streets when the mobs invaded and came over to do great damage to our possession. I was there when they went to the home on that night of the chief justice of our supreme court in Panama and threatened to do him great bodily harm and how he came to the door alone, ready to go with the mob, and but for the personal prestige that he had, he would have been the sacrificial lamb of the mob that invaded the isthmus to do great damage to the American Republic. I want to say that the gentleman who is speaking is held in the highest regard by every American citizen—I refer not to myself but to one who has reserved the time, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD]. He is held in the highest regard by every American citizen in Panama. I can state that ever word he utters upon this floor goes over the wire to Panama at full rate to six newspapers edited in the Republic of Panama. He is about the only American citizen who is fighting for the preservation and defense of the Republic of Panama. He has carried on this fight alone, and only the effects of the last few weeks are bringing some of the rest of us to his defense and to his aid and assistance. I can say that we have a wonderful man in charge.

I am referring to General Potter. There was never a better man in charge of the Panama Canal. He understands the situation and all the ramifications of it.

Mr. FLOOD. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say this. I must compliment the citizens of his great congressional district. If I were there I would certainly vote for him. Let me say that I wish he, with his eloquence and his great knowledge of this problem, would join hands with other Members, such as my distinguished friend from this side of the aisle who spoke a few minutes ago, so that there may be a mass protest in this RECORD of speeches and statements.

I have a resolution before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have a resolution before the great Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. And my friend from Maine whom I see sitting here was in the Committee on Foreign Affairs yesterday when I testified there. They are going to have a hearing on this as soon as the gentle lady from Missouri [Mrs. SULLIVAN] regains her health, which I hope and pray will be soon. So I think we have lit a fire.

But let me say again that I am concerned with the Constitution and the law. If the Congress of the United States in its wisdom and through the propriety of its channels sees fit to amend the treaty with Panama as between one sovereign nation and another, and permit Panama to fly its flag or to have the canal, or whatever Congress wants to do, that is the way it must be done. No President, no Secretary of State by administrative action can impinge upon the sanctity of a treaty or upon the law of the land, which a treaty is under that constitution.

The President of the United States had no right to send his brother, Milton, to hold conferences with officials of a foreign state. These meetings took place at Milton Eisenhower's residence in Baltimore with the Finance Minister of Panama. He had no right to discuss sovereignty. The President, himself, has no such right. That can be acted on only by the Congress of the United States with the Senate as an arm of this body by a two-thirds vote ratifying such a change, or as the supreme law of the land, through any bill of Congress executing that treaty, must be acted upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. Only the judicial and/or the legislative can act, never the executive. And it is about time that the legislative arm of this Government asserts and establishes its equality as one of the three branches of government, because, my friends, you are slipping fast. You do not look as good here as you did 50 years ago. Let us begin all over again. Report out these resolutions. Pass this concurrent resolution.

Why a concurrent resolution? Why did I make it a concurrent resolution? Because a concurrent resolution does not call for any executive fiat. I deplore the practice of chairmen of subcommittees and committees of this House who, when a Member introduces a resolution or a concurrent resolution or a bill, write immediately to some Federal bureaucrat who writes back a letter and says, "I don't like it," and that is the end of the bill or the resolution. Let us put an end to that. Let us stop that here.

I made this a concurrent resolution because I could not care less what the Executive thinks about what my concurrent resolution says. I could not care less. And all praise to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SELDEN], and his chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORGAN], who held these hearings without consulting the Executive on this important problem, in the best tradition of this great body of the Congress. I hope the precedent is followed.

Mr. Speaker, just to show you how silly this question can get, the Republic of Panama by action of its General Assembly unilaterally extended the 3-mile limit of its seacoast to 12 miles around the Panama Canal, making the canal another Berlin. I objected here on this floor, you may remember, and demanded that my Government protest. Do you know what happened the next night in Panama City? The Congress of Panama in its might and majesty upon a motion of its Foreign Minister declared the gentleman from Pennsylvania Panama's public enemy No. 1. My, they play rough. I do not think I have many Panamanians in my district, anyway. Come to think of it, I never thought of that.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HAYS. Did they give the gentleman a medal along with that? They should have. That seems to be quite an honor on this, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. FLOOD. I understand Cuba and my bewhiskered friend is about to do the same thing, not that I can win popularity here but I can sure win it down there.

Mr. HAYS. I would say that to be so honored by the whiskered moron who is presently the dictator of Cuba should enhance the gentleman's stature considerably.

Mr. FLOOD. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Let me emphasize this: I am not the enemy of the people of Panama. I am not a damned Yankee. I was born and raised in St. Augustine, Fla., from the time I was 2 years old until I went to college. I went to Panama with my grandfather as a boy, and I have been going there all my life; how long is none of your business, but it is a long time. So I am not a Johnny-come-lately.

I love these people. These are wonderful people, friendly, polite, warm and charming. There are no bad people anywhere. People are not bad, Mr. Speaker, it is governments and the nations' leaders that are bad. There are no bad Chinese people, there are no bad Russian people. The German people are not bad. The Japanese are not bad people. It is in the leaders that evil lies. These people are my friends. I want to help them.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another observation?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. SCHERER. Is it not a fact that the politicians, the leaders of Panama, have been derelict in their duty to the people of Panama of whom the gentleman is talking? When they divert the attention of the people of Panama from their own shortcomings and their own derelictions they use the United States as a whipping boy.

Mr. FLOOD. As Dean Pound of the Harvard Law School used to say to me when I answered a question for about 15 minutes, "Mr. FLOOD, you have stated the question."

Mr. SCHERER. The gentleman has stated what has been happening. Has it not been that recently a few Communist agents have taken advantage of these alleged grievances against the United States?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, sure. Get me right.

Mr. SCHERER. They have injected themselves into this situation.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not say the Reds started this business. They just moved in when it got nice and hot. They always do that. They come in there with the old stick and stir it up, if you know what I mean. Sure. My southern friends know what I mean. That is all they are doing.

Mr. SCHERER. The basic agitation arises from what the gentleman says is not necessarily the Communists, but the Communists in the last few months have taken over.

Mr. FLOOD. They have taken it over.

Mr. SCHERER. Did they not direct the techniques that were used in the recent invasion of the Canal Zone?

Mr. FLOOD. Let me just read this to you. I will skip about 25 pages here to read this.

In the Republic of Cuba while all this was going on during the dates that I stated just prior to our discussion, this great island country which is on the northern flank of the Atlantic approaches to the canal, a revolution was coming to an end. Its recognized government was overthrown by a radical group headed by Fidel Castro. His administration now revealed as Communist slanted—if I can be polite—is engaged in the process of liquidation by firing squads. Now international communism previously entrenched in Veuezuela is on the southern flank of the Panama Canal. Here you have control by this foreign, alien ideology and these revolutionary systems converging on both flanks like pincers on the canal. I say foreign, alien ideology because I have a resolution before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in which I declare that under the Monroe Doctrine foreign aggrandizement or infiltration by vis-et-armis, as this is, calls for the Congress of the United States to enunciate under these facts and circumstances that this constitutes and is thereby an extension of the Monroe Doctrine to the Western Hemisphere in this case of foreign intervention. In 1960 it does not have to be by vis-et-armis. And mark you, in this foreign intervention from Soviet Russia and her trained allies into these endemic revolutionary and politically disturbed neighbors and friends of the South, we must declare ourselves.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another observation to support just what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. SCHERER. This assault upon the Caribbean is not only taking place in Cuba and Panama, but in all Central America and Puerto Rico; is that not correct?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. It takes in the Caribbean, the whole area.

Mr. SCHERER. Yes; it has occurred in the entire Caribbean. The Committee on Un-American Activities sat just a month or so ago, or less than a month ago, in Puerto Rico and we had a demonstration again of the Communists injecting themselves into a local question.

Mr. FLOOD. I have the report on that. I know what my friend is talking about.

Mr. SCHERER. The Nationalists want indepence for Puerto Rico and, of course, have a basic disagreement with the United States, and again the Communists have injected themselves into that question.

Mr. FLOOD. This is a pattern. My colleague knows, of course, that this is a pattern. He is not surprised at all by any of this, of course.

Mr. SCHERER. I am just trying to get it into the RECORD.

Mr. FLOOD. I appreciate that very much and earnestly hope that my colleague will put all of that information, or as much of it as he can, in the RECORD so that all may read it. My colleague, I know, is very serious about these questions and I thank him for the valuable contribution he has made. I repeat, I hope that my colleague can get all this information into the RECORD.

Mr. SCHERER. I will try to do so.

Mr. FLOOD. Let me tell you. With reference to this Cuban business. What happened? I am giving you the chronological sequence of events and the hour and day and month and year—from the beginning of 1902. On April 26, 1959, armed mercenaries from Cuba in collaboration with Red elements in Panama invaded the Republic of Panama. One part of their avowed plan—and we have the documents from the captured prisoners, was to send their first bombing squads to the constitutional government and territory of the United States. Their plan was to occupy the Canal Zone. Do you know that? The plan of the invaders threw the political leaders of Panama into hysteria. Many of them with their families ran across the Avenue of the Fourth of July. I see sitting here a former Member of this body, and former distinguished Governor of the Canal Zone, Hon. Maurice H. Thatcher of Kentucky, who knows well of what I speak. He has a right to sit here. He was a great Member of this body.

Let me read to you what the President of Panama said that this invasion was. I read to you now the statement of President Ernesto de la Guardia of Panama. I quote:

> This was not just a group of adventurers from our country or even Cuba. These people were mostly Cubans, but directed and led by militant Communists. Their ambition is the long-stated one of taking over the Panama Canal.

Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could be more positive and clear cut than this statement by one in a position to know. How can I make this plainer? President de la Guardia's opinion is supported by overwhelming evidence. The formation of Communist-oriented governments in the Caribbean on both flanks of the Panama Canal approaches and recent attempts to invade several isthmian countries constitute serious threats, not only to the United States but also to all the Americas.

As such, they are clear violations of the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. It has been my observation that had this succeeded, and had these people occupied the Canal Zone, in view of the way the State Department has handled the situation in Panama and Cuba thus far under the present protection of the Latin-American countries, they would have said, "It belongs to them. We had better let them have it."

Mr. FLOOD. I am afraid you are right. I am sick at my stomach, but I am afraid you are right. I believe you. I do not know what is going on.

Now, what was next?

Though this highly provocative incident was witnessed by Panama Canal authorities, the trespassers were not interfered with by Canal Zone police and were allowed to leave the Zone without obstruction.

This 1958 flag-planting mob invasion of the Canal Zone, Mr. Speaker, was not a simple student prank as some of our officials tried to explain, but a calculated move in worldwide psychological warfare of Communist pattern against the United States. It received extensive coverage in Latin America, and also in the Soviet press, further emboldening Panamanian agitators to plan new measures of mob violence. It is, indeed, significant that in this same month of May 1958, that the Vice President of the United States, and his wife, during the latter part of his visit of good will to Latin America, was subjected to the grossest forms of indignity, also perpetuated by students of Peruvian and Venezuelan universities, with the ruthless skill of the trained leadership so characteristic of the Red pattern.

It is extremely pertinent, Mr. Speaker, to state at this juncture that had the United States in the 1936 treaty not abandoned its 1903 treaty obligations for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon, the May 2, 1958, mob invasion would have been unthinkable. As it was, the wolves of disorder had tasted blood.

Subsequent to these grave disturbances, Dr. Milton Eisenhower, brother of the President and president of Johns Hopkins University, visited the Isthmus as a special representative of the U.S. Government. What useful purpose his visit served is not clear, but we shall hear of him later.

CONGRESS FAILS TO REASSERT U.S. ISTHMIAN POLICY

The situation on the isthmus, meantime, did not stabilize. In a Panamanian enactment signed by President Ernesto de la Guardia, Jr., on December 18, 1958, Panama, by unilateral action, attempted to extend its territorial boundaries by sea from the internationally recognized 3-mile limit to a 12-mile limit. This extended area completely encircled the Canal Zone and, in fact, was aimed at making the Panama Canal another Berlin. Because I so described it in an address to the House of Representatives of the United States, I was formally declared by the National Assembly of Panama as "Panama's No. 1 gratuitous enemy."

Here I wish to assert again that I am not an enemy of Panama and that, if Panama has any enemy No. 1, he is among its own radicals, demagogues, and revolutionaries who seem willing to bring their country to the brink of ruin in order to enhance their own political fortunes.

In a note to Panama, delivered on January 7, 1959, the United States refused to recognize the Panamanian claim for wider territorial seas. In addition to the technical objections raised by the State Department to the attempted extension, I would say that it is a clear violation of the sovereignty provisions in Articles II and III of the 1903 Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, which because of their basic importance I shall quote in part for ready availability:

ARTICLE II

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the centerline of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low water with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities * * * shall not be included within this grant. * * *

ARTICLE III

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article II * * * which the United States would possess and exercise if it were sovereign of the territory * * * to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

It is well here to point out that in 1903, when the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty was ratified by Panama, the limits of the territorial waters of the Republic and the Canal Zone were coterminus. No subsequent agreement has changed these limits. Any change in them would necessarily apply to the Canal Zone as well as to the Republic.

The Department of State acted wisely in refusing to recognize the Panamanian claim for which action it deserves to be commended.

On the same day on which the U.S. note was delivered to Panama, January 9, 1959, I again introduced a concurrent resolution to reaffirm our Isthmian Canal policy, House Concurrent Resolution 33, 86th Congress. A concurrent resolution, it should be stressed, does not require Executive approval but is an expression of the sense and judgment of the Congress. Despite this fact, the cognizant committee referred it to the executive department for consideration and recommendation. Of course, Mr. Speaker, under the prevailing attitude of appeasement here, appeasement there, and appeasement everywhere, the response was negative and the Congress was not given an opportunity to vote on a measure to declare its own sense and judgment concerning this crucial question.

Thus, radicals in Panama had the way cleared for further advancement of their plans in a situation which could only end in tragedy for all concerned.

PANAMA RADICALS CREATE SERIOUS INCIDENTS

Meanwhile, in the Republic of Cuba, the great island country on the northern flank of the Atlantic approaches to the Panama Canal a revolution was nearing the end. Its recognized government was overthrown by a radical group headed by Fidel Castro. His administration, now revealed as Communist slanted, has engaged in the process of liquidation of its enemies by firing squads and extensive confiscation of American property by expropriation. With international communism previously entrenched in Venezuela on the southern flank, the conquest of Cuba through subversion saw both flanks of the Atlantic approaches to the Panama area controlled by alien revolutionary systems, which now are converging toward the canal itself.

Thus, it is not strange, Mr. Speaker, that nearly a year after the 1958 Panamanian flag-planting mob invasion of the Canal Zone, on April 26, 1959, armed mercenaries from Cuba, in collaboration with radical elements in Panama, invaded that Republic. One part of their plan was to make token occupation of the Canal Zone; another, to overthrow the constitutional government of President de la Guardia. But underlying all was the ultimate objective of driving the United States from its control of the Panama Canal.

The landing of the invaders threw political leaders and the upper class Panamanians into hysteria and confusion. The man in the street became apprehensive because of the obvious anxiety of government leaders. They would have become far more deeply concerned had they known that some top Panamanian government officials moved their families into the Canal Zone—an area that has so often served as a political sanctuary in times of crises in the Republic.

Fortunately, the attempted invasion proved abortive, with the invaders surrendering to Panamanian authorities after intervention by the Organization of American States and the United States. But they were released with practically no punishment. Will there be more invasions of the American isthmus? The indications are that there will.

Who were those invaders is a question frequently asked. The best answer to that query was supplied by President de la Guardia himself, who, after the invasion stated:

> That was not just a group of adventurers from our country or even from Cuba. These people were mostly Cubans, but directed and led by militant Communists. Their ambition is the long-stated one of taking over the Panama Canal.

Nothing, Mr. Speaker, could be more positive and clear cut than this statement by one in a position to know. Moreover, President de la Guardia's opinion is supported by overwhelming evidence. The formation of Communist-oriented governments in the Caribbean on both flanks of the Panama Canal approaches and recent attempts to invade several isthmian countries constitutes serious threats, not only to the United States, but also to all the Americas.

Unfortunately, the moves in the conquest of Latin American countries through infiltration and subversion have been made with such skillful secrecy as to beguile our people with a false sense of security. But they should no longer be taken by surprise by seemingly sudden invasions, disorders, and extreme nationalistic agitations.

Mr. Allen W. Dulles, Director of Central Intelligence, recently stated:

> "Nationalism," as a slogan for the breaking of the ties of friendship between us and the countries of this hemisphere, was the line given the Latin American Communist leaders who attended the 21st Party Congress in Moscow last February (1959). Details for the execution of this policy were then outlined to these leaders and some of the fruits of this planning can be seen today in Panama, Cuba, and elsewhere in this hemisphere.

By the time the impact of the April 26, 1959, invasion of Panama was over, the stage was being set for the next move. This was to be a peaceful occupation of the Canal Zone on November 3, 1959—the 56th anniversary of Panama's independence from Colombia.

The leaders for this were Aquilino Boyd, a former Minister of Foreign Affairs of Panama and now a candidate for President, also Ernesto J. Castillero. They published their plans. Thus, it is not remarkable that it was possible for me to address this body on July 29, 1959, warning against exactly what was to occur, also again to notify proper executive authorities of the pending danger.

Yet these various and most grave incidents and threats seem to have made no impact on the minds and consciences of those in positions of responsibility in the executive departments or even in the Congress itself.

NOVEMBER 3 AND 28, 1959

Independence Day celebration in Panama started normally with President de la Guardia, the officers of his Government, and the diplomatic corps attending colorful ceremonies in and near the historic Panama Cathedral. In the suburbs of the city all was quiet, but alongside the Panama Canal Zone border at the Pacific end of the canal radical demonstrators were gathering in defiance of what the Panamanian Government had advised.

Canal Zone authorities had taken precautions against the entrance of unruly groups into the Canal Zone, with police and firemen ready for eventualities. A demonstrator made a grab for the pistol of a Canal Zone policeman who plucked him from a marching group, and the worst boundary violence in Isthmian history was under way.

Pummeled with rocks and insulted with profane and obscene epithets, Canal Zone police used remarkable restraint in repelling the assault. But they and the firemen alone were not strong enough to withstand the attack, which forced the Governor of the Canal Zone to call upon the U.S. Army to take over the task of protection against the mob.

Frustrated in their designs, the mob then turned upon American property in Panama. They burned a Panama Railroad passenger car in the railroad terminal, looted stores, and, with Aquilino Boyd among them, stormed the U.S. Embassy, where they tore the American flag from the Embassy mast, ripped it to pieces, and instead, hoisted the Panamanian flag. Lesser disturbances occurred at the Atlantic end of the canal.

It is indeed regrettable that the Panama National Guard did not make timely attempts to maintain order on that fateful day. It was later learned that it had received orders not to appear.

Further details of these disorders are not needed for presentation here, for they are covered comprehensively in the papers of Panama. They were generally ignored in the press of the United States, which has long maintained a near blackout of important news from the Isthmus.

Did the U.S. administration issue a prompt and courageous statement backing up Canal Zone authorities to the hilt and warning that further efforts to invade the Zone would be repelled by force if Panamanian authorities were unable or unwilling to hold radicals and their Communist monitors in check? It did not.

Instead, the President, at his news conference of November 4, minimized the disorders as "really only an incident" and later sent a diplomatic emissary to Panama to appease those stirring up the trouble. Is there any wonder that the Panama National Assembly, by resolution on November 5, condemned Canal

Zone authorities and vowed "not to rest until the Panama flag is raised on our territory on the Canal Zone."

Finally, on November 28, Panamanian mobs attempted to invade the Canal Zone a second time. On this occasion, the U.S. Army initially repelled the invaders until, at U.S. Army request, it was joined in restoring order by the Panama National Guard. The Panamanian forces won prompt public commendation from U.S. Government officials who had not seen fit to commend American authorities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the floor of the House of Representatives and speaking from a knowledge gleaned from the press of Panama, both English and Spanish, as well as from an extensive correspondence with witnesses, I wish to express my high admiration for the manner in which Canal Zone authorities, both civil and military, stood their ground during these crucial tests, especially the members of the Canal Zone Police and Fire Departments and the soldiers of the Army. They fought with their backs to the wall and measured up to the highest traditions of patriotism and service, also with the restraint and forbearance that comes with responsibility and power.

I will say that, at least. Nobody else wants to.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. I am delighted to join with the gentleman in paying respects to the Governor of the Canal Zone, General Potter.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Ohio knows him long and well.

Mr. BOW. For the excellent job he has done. I join with the gentleman in his praise of General Potter and the others in the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. FLOOD. I knew the gentleman would, and I am delighted to have my friend, who is a student of this problem, who I am proud to say sits alongside of me on the Panama Canal Subcommittee, take this position. He knows little Joe Potter. He is a great guy. We love him more, and I am grateful for those words of the gentleman from Ohio.

I do not feel lost, Mr. Speaker. I will sleep happy tonight. I thought I was alone. I knew this House would see the light. This is not political. I have given you a recitation through five Presidents of all parties. This is not partisan. That is why it is nice and warming to see this House exhibit itself at its best when it knows the facts. The people of this Nation have always, when they know the facts, done the right thing. They always have when they know.

I am just a mouthpiece for you to tell them, to tell you. Everybody cannot do all this work. You have your own things to do.

Mr. Speaker, this was an ugly situation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In reference to this statement that you cannot do all our work. Many of us find that we have plenty to do and we have to rely on the gentleman and other Members to tell us.

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Personally, I want to express my gratitude for the work the gentleman has done. It has been very, very helpful.

Mr. FLOOD. I am very grateful to the old warhorse from Michigan. He has been my friend and I have admired him for a long time. Those are heartwarming things to hear.

"TITULAR SOVEREIGNTY" AND THE PANAMA FLAG

Meanwhile, amid a tremendous buildup in the Panama press, a State Department emissary arrived on the isthmus for a series of conferences. What special qualifications he had for such a mission are not shown by his record. But after 3 days of discussions, on November 24, he asserted that the United States "reiterated U.S. recognition, 'stated more than 50 years ago,' of Panama's titular sovereignty over the Canal Zone," which was not acceptable to Panamanian demagogues. Canal Zone residents were shocked by the implied surrender of American sovereign rights without the authorization of the Congress. And, I should add, this emissary was acting under orders of the Secretary of State.

Of special interest, Mr. Speaker, were some unexpected revelations that events on the isthmus at this time were to stimulate. One was that on November 3, 1959, Panama was expecting a declaration by the United States acknowledging Panamanian sovereignty over the Canal Zone and that this expectation was based on conversations of the Minister of Finance, Fernando Eleta, with Dr. Milton Eisenhower on September 13, 1958, at Dr. Eisenhower's home in Baltimore.

So startling was this disclosure that the State Department was apparently constrained to issue what seemed to be a formal denial that Dr. Eisenhower had made "any statement which could be construed to commit the U.S. Government to any course of action."

Such an assertion, Mr. Speaker, was not a forthright denial of the statement attributed to the brother of the President, but a cleverly worded phrasing that is definitely misleading. Of course, the United States cannot be bound by the statement of a private citizen even though he is the brother of the President. Nor, may I say, can any official of our Government abrogate surrender or annul the solemn obligations of our treaties with other nations. That, under our Constitution, can be done only by means of new treaty provisions promulgated by and with the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate. Otherwise, chaos would follow.

Thus, a controversy over what the President's brother said has added so much fuel to the flames of the ugly situation in Panama that nothing short of open declaration on the subject of sovereignty will meet the situation presented. Because the State Department has made such a complete fiasco over many years on this matter, this question is raised: What are the influences that have been controlling, and still seem to be controlling, the State Department's actions? Regardless of what the intentions may have been, they give aid and comfort to the avowed enemies of the United States, and, indeed, of the entire free world, at a most critical hour, and render our country's task of maintaining this great waterway for the shipping of all lands and the defense of each and every country of the Western Hemisphere more difficult.

We have competent, courageous, and well-informed people on isthmian questions in this country.

Why is it that these exceptional men and women are not being used for the exceptional situations instead of relying on routine underlings, totally anonymous advisers. I cannot find out about them, and the ones I do find out about nobody has ever heard of. These surrenders we are making on the advice of these incompetents. These people in the State Department, as far as I am concerned, are just as good Americans as you or I. I do not believe all of this hogwash and nonsense. They are good Americans. They are honest men, they mean well. But they are stupid. They make mistakes and they are wrong. But that is something else again. I can remember that a few years ago I made a mistake. So there you know it can happen. These are not un-Americans. These are not evil people. They are not very bright, but you can do something about that. These are simply history lessons.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the feeling of the residents in the Canal Zone when they read about that meeting on December 21, 1959. Who advised the President of the United States, this great and good man, and I think he is a great and good man, the greatest general we ever had or that any other nation ever had. I knew him when he was a buck colonel. I worked with him for years. Who told Ike this? He did not know it. How could he know? Nobody but God Almighty could do the job of President of the United States. No man can do it, no human being. He is doing the best he can. He did not know these things. If he had he would never have said that the United States of America will recognize the titular sovereignty of Panama. That came from some striped-pants guy. He has to depend on people.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Of course, after the way we acted in the Suez crisis, somebody in the State Department helped the takeover there, and probably they were just trying to be consistent in saying that if the Panamanians want the canal, there is not much we can do but say, "It is yours."

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Mr. HAYS. Of course, we paid for it.

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Mr. HAYS. We kept it up. They did not have a dime invested in it.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, say, by the way, in all these conversations, in all these negotiations about what we should give them, and ultimately give them the canal, nobody talks about dough at all. We are not to be compensated if and when—God forbid that would ever happen. You know that.

Mr. HAYS. Do you think you or I could do this with the Riggs Bank, by simply just going down and taking over?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think they ever heard about the Riggs Bank.

Mr. HAYS. I am not sure they ever heard about any one of us, but by the same token, we could say "This belongs to us, and we are taking over."

Mr. FLOOD. And the only thing I know about the Riggs Bank is what I read one day, that Daniel Webster had an account there.

Mr. HAYS. It is no more ridiculous in walking to the Riggs Bank and saying "We are taking over" than saying to the Legislature of Panama that it belongs to them.

Mr. FLOOD. That is classic logic for which the House recognizes the gentleman from Ohio. Of course, that is right. My trouble is, I cannot say the things as aptly. It takes me two hours.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. One other trouble you have, and that is in knowing so much and telling us about it. That must disturb some folks down the street.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, I do not know about that. The gentleman has been here much longer than I have. I have been here 15 years, and I think the last people before you were the Indians. So, I believe you.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have not learned anything since I have been here, but you have, and I certainly appreciate what you said today.

Mr. FLOOD. Nobody works harder here than the gentleman from Michigan. In all things he does a good job. I do not agree with him very often, but certainly I regard him highly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, if once in a while I get your recognition, that is good enough.

Mr. FLOOD. I will settle for that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. As long as the voters return me.

Mr. FLOOD. That is right.

Now, nationalization is not the only issue here. There are strange vascular groups who want to internationalize. You have to twist your face out of shape from now on and go from nationalization to internationalization. This is a new one. Somebody wants to internationalize it. Then, do you know what happened in the last couple of months? Now somebody wants to regionalize the internationalization. And, you think you have gobbledly-gook in Washington. Aye, aye, aye. Only these fellows are not fouling. You have a great sense of humor here today; these fellows do not have any. These are some of the long-haired, flat-heeled friends who dream up these things. They are do-gooders. They mean well, you know, but hold your watch.

Now, Fidel Castro and his agents sit upon these international boards. You internationalize this canal, and it goes to the Hague tribunal upon a motion by Panama, and the recently appointed member of the court at the Hague tribunal is a former Minister of Foreign Affairs of Panama. Happy New Year. Well, that is the way it is.

Now, one thing more, Mr. Speaker. We have done a lot for these people, and we should. Much time has been lost in our giving away this bargaining power. There have been defaults on the part of the obligations by Panama. They did not maintain order in Colon and Panama as they are required by treaty. But, basic to the proper action is an understanding of our mission in the Panama Canal—just what I am talking about here. This is an interoceanic public utility operated and maintained by the United States pursuant to treaty as a mandate for civilization and the world. And, it is part of your coast line. That is what we are talking about. This is no game for boys. I am not talking about that lower 40. Panama Canal operations must not be weakened and confused through ill-advised policies of placating these people. Our position is one required by law and international law pursuant to the treaty to be so self-sustaining with tolls that are just and reasonable for the transit of vessels of all nations at all times.

And I hope Nasser hears that.

We are operating this canal under the Concordat of Constantinople of 1888 under which the Suez Canal is supposed to be operated. We are abiding by that Concordat. We are not stopping anybody's ships, even Jewish ships. Ah, he makes a point of that.

Now, these are the facts. We reorganized this management. This is a successful, going business and a fair profit is being made. This is an arm created by this Congress. This is a corporation created by Congress. You are on the board of directors. I do not think you will get very rich in it, but you are on the board here. You ought to know what is going on. Your businesslike operation of the canal is one thing but, Mr. Speaker, relief for the Republic of Panama is something else. The two must never be confused. The Panama Canal must never be allowed to degenerate into a relief agency for the Republic of Panama. It was never intended that way. Nobody but the Congress of the United States can make it that way. You can do anything you want with it; it is your baby—but only you.

PANAMA CANAL: SYMBOL OF FOURTH FRONT

We cannot view this as an isolated question separate and quarantined from the world and everything else in it. This is related directly to events all over the world as every action today on the face of this earth is interrelated and interbalanced. There is no place to hide, not any more.

For many months the nations of this hemisphere have watched the steadily rising Red tide in various parts of Latin America, especially among the countries of the Caribbean. It is indeed significant that there is a campaign of the communistically controlled press in Cuba to end immediately the occupation of our Guantanamo Naval Base. "Yankee, get out of Guantanamo." You have no worse or more bitter enemy in the world than Williams in Trinidad. "Get out of Chaguaramos." "Get out of Guantanamo." "Get out of the canal." "Yankee, go home." This is Red patter.

This does not come from the hearts of the Panamanians or the Cubans or the nice people in Trinidad—no. I will never believe that to my dying day. I know them.

Prior to World War II the great fear of the nations most likely to be involved was that of a two-front war—East and West. As to that danger, the United States was protected by two ocean barriers, patrolled by the Atlantic and Pacific fleets with provision for a quick shifting of forces between the oceans by means of the Panama Canal.

Since World War II, Mr. Speaker, that strategic setup has changed radically, incident to the advent of powerful aircraft, nuclear submarines, ballistic missiles, and other modern weapons. The protective barriers once afforded by the vast expanses of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and the icy wastes of the Arctic have in substantial degree been overcome, making them avenues for attacking the United States from three directions. To provide defenses on these three fronts the Congress has appropriated billions. I just came from a hearing of my Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Defense where the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Tom Gates, our new fine Secretary of Defense, from the great State of Pennsylvania, of course, were giving us these new details in the new budget.

This is not Buck Rogers business, this is not tomorrow, it is last night, today.

While thus preoccupied what has happened in our backyard to the south? In the vital area of the Caribbean, the forces behind the world revolutionary movement have focused on countries there with oft-repeated aim of bringing about the destruction of the United States and our system of constitutional liberty. Encouraged by the formation of communistically oriented governments in Cuba and other Western Hemisphere countries, these forces, recognizing the Panama Canal as the strategic center of the Americas, have concentrated on the Isthmus of Panama.

In this light, Mr. Speaker, the Panama Canal has become the principal target and symbol of a fourth front in a situation comparable to that which, in 1823, was faced by President Monroe when he proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine. The time has certainly come to extend that doctrine to guard against the intervention of international communism by means of penetration and subversion. To that end, the United States, as the most powerful leader among the nations of the free world, should make clear to our friends and enemies all over the world that, in the exercise of our inherent right of self-defense and in the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine, we are determined not to permit the intervention of international communism to endanger the peace and safety of our Nation or of other countries of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that under no circumstances at any time and for no reason must the flag of the Republic of Panama be permitted to be placed by the Republic of Panama over constitutionally sovereign territory of the United States of America unless by constitutional action of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOW. May I compliment the gentleman on his very excellent address, which shows a great deal of study and work. It is apparent that the gentleman is a student of the situation not only in Panama but throughout the Caribbean.

I am delighted that the gentleman in his address has made it amply clear that he is making no attack upon the people of Panama, that he is making no attack on the people of Trinidad, and, of course, not on the people of Cuba.

I think the gentleman will join with me in the thought that the countries to the south, in Latin America, whether in Central America, the Caribbean area, or South America itself, are a bulwark of great strength for our Nation. There are many, many people who love the United States and who would defend us if the necessity came.

I think it is imperative that we on the floor of the House confine ourselves to actions such as the gentleman has taken so that we recognize the people to the south as our good friends. I wish it were in the power of many of us to be able to travel in South and Central America to learn the real friendship and the warmth of the hearts of those people. When you hear people talk about anti-American feeling, I do not believe it is anti-American feeling. I think the feeling of those people sometimes is one of neglect, that we have looked to the East and to the West.

We have given of our Treasury to the East and West and we have neglected to look to the South where we have such a great potential of friendship.

Mr. FLOOD. I wish I had said that. My colleague has said it so well, I wish I had said that.

Mr. BOW. It seems to me, as we go to the East and to the West in our troubles that we are looking back over our shoulders at history. But, when you go to the South, where we have this great potential of friends, you are looking forward to the horizon of a possible new day of great strength in this hemisphere. I join with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the hope that the Department of State and the Congress and our Executive will bend every effort to see that we tap this great reservoir of friendship with the peoples of Latin America.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, how I join you in that hope and how I thank you.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. I commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania for making this fine address to the Members of the House. I hope those of the Members who were not able to hear the gentleman's speech will read it. I express the further hope that I will have the opportunity to support the gentleman's resolution which is now pending before the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FLOOD. May I say to my friend, the gentleman from Alabama, who sits with me on the defense appropriations' subcommittee, and we know the gentleman as an expert on naval affairs, I would like to see the gentleman use his influence and knowledge of the navy over a period of so many years to reactivate at a Caribbean station the old Caribbean unit—the Special Service Squadron to show the flag to our friends—and not as the great Yankee from the north, but as my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, has stated to build friendship and better understanding between us.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. I would like to add my commendation to that of my other colleagues for the great contribution the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made here today to my personal thinking, and I am sure to the thinking of most of the Members of Congress and the thinking of the people of the United States. This is a much greater danger than even many of us thought. We are grateful to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania for bringing these facts out before this great deliberative body. I might add that while this last invasion of the sovereign territory of the United States, which links East and West, and which is vitally needed not only for the defense of our Nation but for the defense of the whole free world—while these plans were being laid, Khrushchev was in this country parading arounding accepting the hospitality of the people of this great country. I would like to point out today that these plans are continuing to be laid even when we have summit conferences at Camp David and other places to subvert the national defense of this great Nation and its leadership of the free world that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Alabama and others are so ably working on and trying to protect and defend.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, when this fellow Khrushchev came here, I was not here. The Congress adjourned at 6:20 a.m., and I left town at 6:21 a.m.—and I will give you five guesses why. Khrushchev came in at 10 o'clock. I do not think my colleague from South Carolina was here either.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. I left, too.

Mr. FLOOD. My friend and colleague the gentleman from South Carolina was named after the great William Jennings Bryan, who, as Secretary of State, enunciated many of these things that I have mentioned here today about the Panama Canal. My friend was well named.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. CHELF. I, too, would like to join my colleagues in commending the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] on his magnificent statement which has just been made on the state of the Union as it appears and as it is in Panama. My friend has forgotten more accidentally than I will ever know on purpose with respect to this particular problem. But I can say this—and I know this for a sure thing: I have always wanted to go to Panama, but I have always been too busy, as the gentleman pointed out when he said that we have been too busy to go south of the border, so to speak. But I did take it upon myself this past October to go to Panama and see firsthand just what is happening and what is going on down there. I can say this to you this afternoon: Every word that you have uttered is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I can say that for the very simple reason that while I was there I could see this thing fomenting. It was going on at that time. They were preparing for a showdown, if you please, on November 3. I want to commend the gentleman for the statement he has made with respect to General Potter. I think the gentleman did a magnificent job—a beautiful job. I am proud of him as an American.

I think he ought to be promoted. It is LPD.

Mr. FLOOD. I just promoted him an hour ago.

Mr. CHELF. I am for that. I am for promoting him again.

Mr. FLOOD. I agree with that. Well, you are just an old broken down World War hero, having had your stomach shot out. So I know how you feel. You are telling the truth.

Mr. CHELF. We will rue the day that we let them fly the Panamanian flag alongside of ours.

Mr. FLOOD. That is true. You are made of the right stuff.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALFORD. I would like to go on record, as all of my other distinguished colleagues, I think it is very significant that from both sides of the aisle we have commendations for the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD]; this is no sectional or partisan issue about which we are speaking. We are all sincerely interested in the welfare of this country. I wish to associate my remarks with the distinguished gentlemen who have spoken in commendation on this fine argumentation you have presented, and in asking for further study at all levels of government. It is a serious problem. I wish to go on record as opposing any recognition of any Panamanian sovereignty over the Canal Zone, titular, or otherwise. In association with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHELF] and as a former member of the Armed Forces of this country, we will oppose forever the flying of any flag above that of the United States of America in the Canal Zone.

Mr. FLOOD. That is the first time I ever heard you make a speech in Congress. That was fine. I could not have done any better myself.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, who is chairman of the Subcommittee of Latin America of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. I certainly shall yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SELDEN. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, the subcommittee to which he referred is conducting hearings at this time on the situation in the Canal Zone and our relations with the Republic of Panama. On Saturday last I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State, in which I pointed out the possibility of permitting the Panamanian Flag to be flown in the Canal Zone was a matter of grave concern to many Members of Congress. I asked him to delay a final decision on that question until the subcommittee had had an opportunity to go into this matter fully. Assistant Secretary of State Roy R. Rubottom, Jr. appeared before the subcommittee on Friday. We had the privilege of hearing the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] yesterday. We expect to hear a representative from the Department of Defense on Friday. Also, we have issued an invitation to General Potter, as well as a representative of American citizens of the Canal Zone to appear.

Mr. FLOOD. I will wager you that Tom Gates, Secretary of Defense, will leave no opportunity for flying the flag in that military area. I will bet on that.

Mr. SELDEN. Certainly the gentleman's testimony before the subcommittee yesterday and the fine documentation presented today gives the members of my subcommittee as well as Members of Congress information that should be extremely helpful.

Mr. FLOOD. Will you please do this? I will yield to you if you will ask unanimous consent to insert at the end of my remarks your letter to Secretary Herter.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my letter of January 9, 1960, to Hon. Christian A. Herter, Secretary of State, be inserted at the end of the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a copy of a letter that I wrote to the President of the United States with respect to the Panama Canal problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

(Copy of letter follows:)

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C. November 16, 1959.

Hon. DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It has come to my attention that the Panamanian Government has officially requested the removal of Maj. Gen. W. E. Potter, the Governor of the Canal Zone. I have been informed that this demand has been made because Governor Potter used the necessary force to stop certain riots, the destruction of American property on Canal Zone territory and the actual tearing down and tearing up of our American flag on November 3 by well-intentioned Panamanians but who unfortunately were led and inspired by Communists and several local "freeloading" Panamanian politicos who would barter their mother's soul for a vote on election day.

Mr. President, it just so happens that I was in Panama and in the Canal Zone for about 10 days just prior to these riots. Everywhere I went, even with my limited Spanish, I could hear and understand that there were going to be demonstrations against the United States on November 3, Panama's Independence Day. It was even in the local newspapers that trouble was mounting day by day and apparently the present Panamanian Government took no steps to prevent it. The best evidence of this, of course, is that the rioting went off exactly on schedule and at the places designated previously. Governor Potter, in my estimation, acted wisely, calmly and in the best interests of peace, decency and of the United States of America. For this great leader to be removed, reprimanded, or even unkindly spoken to about this matter would be a travesty on justice. It would injure a fine officer and gentleman for doing his duty and, what's infinitely worse, it would be coddling those few selfish politicos of Panama who, with the help of Communists and Communist sympathizers, started the whole insurrection for their own personal and political aggrandizement. Those same flea-bitten, cheap Communist demagogs who are hellbent upon starting trouble with the United States and the freedom loving, God-fearing Panamanians, have been furnished a blueprint and a complete pattern as to just how Colonel Nasser did the job in the Suez Canal with the British. Unfortunately, Mr. President, I am told that the lawmakers in the National Assembly of Panama are now insisting on flying the Panamanian flag over our U.S. property in the Canal Zone, which is ours by solemn treaty. By doing this they are unwittingly giving aid, comfort, and support to these Communist safeblowers who would again crucify our Lord, Jesus Christ, if given the chance. If this attitude continues, as a Member of Congress, I shall have to vote to cut down on all of our appropriations affecting Panama because we must let it be known that the American people are sick and tired to the quick of being "used" and then attacked. We absolutely cannot tolerate any future support for the leadership of any country that allows itself to be swayed by a few radical incompetents whose aim is to foment trouble between the great Panamanian people and their strong ally and longtime friend, Uncle Sam.

This is the time and the place to vigorously support Governor Potter and all of our splendid Americans in the Canal Zone more than ever before.

Mr. President, you and I, and the entire world for that matter, know that the United States has been one of the best friends that Panama has had. We gave them more than a just trade for the original Canal Zone by and through a fair and honorable treaty. We ended yellow fever, completed the job the French had left undone and started the ships moving in the Panama Canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. Since that time we have upped our commitments to the Panamanian Government, and even in 1955, under your own administration, the United States voluntarily agreed to grant Panama many more concessions. A $30 million bridge was given to them, plus many new assists to their economy. Unfortunately our kindness to Panama has been seized upon by ambitious and lying politicos as a weakness.

While I was in the Canal Zone I learned that our Army, Navy, our U.S. employees, and all of our enterprises in the Canal Zone together pump into the economy of Panama nearly $180 million per year. Without this amount of money this fine little nation could not survive or exist because even with it there is much poverty. It is amongst these poor unfortunates that selfish Communist politicos have plied their trade. Mr. President, I have met and I have talked with many good, substantial, salt-of-the-earth Panamanians who are deeply grateful to our country for what we have done and we are now doing for Panama. I have visited with these good people in their homes, have talked to them in their shops and business centers, and in every conversation I have had with these wonderful people I was asked not to judge the real Panamanian people by these Communistic politicos who are not only without a conscience but who are daily trying to gain or regain office by using Uncle Sam as the big bad wolf; who is responsible for everybody's troubles all over Panama and the world. Mr. President, I could tell you much I saw and heard recently in Panama but in the final analysis suffice it to say that Governor Potter and the entire complement of our Army, Navy, and civilian employees in the Canal Zone are doing a magnificent job. I am proud of them. As a Member of Congress I commend them to you as their Commander in Chief. I salute them for their loyalty, devotion to duty, patriotism, and their courage in representing the United States of America in the best possible tradition.

I send my best wishes to you for success on your forthcoming trip. May a permanent peace, happiness, and prosperity emanate from it.

Sincerely your friend,

FRANK CHELF,
Member of Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. For that purpose, I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 445, which embodies the language and principles of our historic foreign policies. This measure, Mr. Speaker, is not based on a blind devotion to the past, but on a realistic appraisal of the present with a view of the future.

PROGRAM FOR ISTHMIAN SECURITY

The history of the United States-Panama relations since 1936 conclusively shows that they have not been improved by sustained surrenders. Rather, they have progressively worsened in proportion to these surrenders.

The time has come for all appeasement to end and for positive measures because the Panama Canal is a symbol of U.S. power and prestige. To that end, we must be definite and firm.

The program, which I would suggest, should include:

First. Reaffirmation of our historic policy of exclusive sovereign control of the Canal Zone and Panama Canal along the lines outlined in House Concurrent Resolution 33, 86th Congress.

Second. Announcement that no hostile or other provocative demonstrations or invasions will be tolerated in the Canal Zone or within the strategic vicinity of the Panama Canal.

Third. Reactivation under the direct control of the Chief of Naval Operations, of the Special Service Squadron for continuous display of the flag in the Caribbean area and other missions of diplomatic character.

Fourth. Proclamation by our Government that the Canal Zone is constitutionally acquired territory by the United States.

Fifth. Extension of the Monroe Doctrine to include penetration and subversion by means of a concurrent resolution of the Congress.

As to the urgency for action on this program, the unfortunate events at Panama November 3 to 28, 1959, and recently in Cuba, speak far more eloquently than anything I can say. The questions that I have described are not local, but developments in a worldwide movement focusing on Panama. So far, the forces for undermining U.S. authority have had a virtually unobstructed field, with no organized counterforce. We must supply the countermeasures now, and, in doing so, we act not only for the just and indispensable rights of the United States to discharge its treaty obligations to all the world with respect to the Panama Canal, but as well to safeguard the peace and safety of the world.

One more final remark, Mr. Speaker, starting on November 14, as a result of the attempted Panamanian mob invasion of the Canal Zone, I made a series of press releases dealing with various aspects of the recent canal crises as they developed. The releases follow, together with House Concurrent Resolution 33 and House Concurrent Resolutions 445 and 450, of the present Congress.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, January 9, 1960.

Hon. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
Secretary of State
Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have been informed that the question of permitting the Panamanian flag to be flown in the Canal Zone, and on ships transiting the canal, is currently under consideration in the Department of State, but that no decision has yet been made.

The possibility of permitting the Panamanian flag to be flown in this territory in which the United States possesses and exercises, under treaty, the powers it would have if it were the sovereign of the territory—to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such powers or authority, is currently a matter of grave concern to many Members of the House of Representatives, a number of whom have spoken to me on this subject.

When the 1955 treaty was under consideration in the United States Senate, the Department of State explained at that time in some detail why permission to so fly the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone had heretofore been denied.

The Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs has started executive session meetings to study the situation in the Canal Zone and our relations with the Republic of Panama.

As chairman of the subcommittee I am writing respectfully to request that no final decision on the question of permitting the flying of the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone be taken until the subcommittee has an opportunity to go into this matter further.

With very best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ARMISTEAD I. SELDEN, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks, I include the following releases and concurrent resolutions:

RELEASE OF SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1959

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD said today that the power of the Congress should be used to support Gov. W. E. Potter, of the Canal Zone, in his continuing battle with individuals from Panama who are asking that Potter be kicked out of his high position following the outbreak of November 3 when large groups of Panamanians invaded the Canal Zone, tore down and destroyed the U.S. flag in front of the U.S. Embassy, and committed other acts of violence to U.S.-owned property.

Potter countered this outrageous conduct by requesting U.S. Armed Forces to chase the rioters back over into the Republic of Panama from where the march originated, a march ostensibly to mark the anniversary of Panama's independence from the Republic of Colombia, but, in reality, has been characterized as a politically inspired blackjacking and blackmailing method to squeeze more and more concessions from the United States in the way of higher annuity payments and other considerations.

In fighting this unprovoked attack upon territory which the United States holds in perpetuity under a treaty signed with Panama earlier in this century, Potter has been castigated in some of the leading newspapers in Panama and in speeches made by some public officials and others there. They have asked that he be ousted from his vital job as Governor of the Canal Zone and replaced by someone more to their liking.

When FLOOD got these reports from Panama, he immediately dispatched a letter to Potter in which he expressed his support of Potter "100 percent" and told Potter not to be unduly concerned by these "radical pronouncements" because "your friends, in and out of Congress, will stand behind you in your battle against these forces of evil."

"Now that the November 3 crisis has abated," FLOOD stated in his communication to Potter, "I wish to extend my heartiest commendation for the successful meeting of what I consider the most serious challenge ever made with respect to U.S. control over the Panama Canal, and especially the effective manner in which the mob invasion was repelled.

"Let us hope that the precedent thus created may prove a turning point in our relations not only with Panama, but also with all Latin America in general for I believe this to have been the first time in many years that we have stood our ground as we should."

FLOOD warned, however, that even though the more radical elements in Panama have been temporarily frustrated by U.S. action of November 3, "they can be expected to exert their efforts in other directions" to thwart U.S. operations in the Canal Zone.

"Beware of sabotage," FLOOD warned Potter. "Soviet-trained saboteurs, who have been sent all over the world to lurk behind the scenes and to bring about destruction in some form or other, may attempt to damage or destroy vital features of the Canal and other U.S. installations on the Isthmus."

In his interest in the Panama Canal and the sovereign rights of the United States there, FLOOD speaks from a position of wide and detailed knowledge as he has been the leading speaker in Congress on this subject for a number of years and, further, is closely related to the problems of the zone in his capacity as a Member of the House Appropriations Committee where Federal funds are determined annually for the operation of this enterprise.

RELEASE OF WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1959

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD, of Pennsylvania, today released the following statement regarding the crucial situation at Panama:

"President Eisenhower's proposed order that would prohibit U.S. military post exchanges and commissaries in the Panama Canal Zone from making lowest price open market purchases is truly shocking. Not only is this a gross violation of the rights of our servicemen and dependents there, but also is an ignominious abandonment of sound business practice in an effort to appease radical agitators in Panama and is a shameful submission to political blackmail, all of which will inevitably have worldwide consequences involving heavy costs to all servicemen overseas as well as to the American taxpayer.

"While it is all right to give Panamanians preference where they meet open competition and inspection safeguards, it is altogether wrong to make purchases from them where they are unable to meet fair competition and such standards. Under the policy proposed it is inevitable that prices will be raised to inordinate figures which U.S. purchasing authorities will be forced to accept in violation of the principles upon which rests the act of 1950 placing the Panama Canal on a self-sustaining and sound business basis. The possibilities for evil thus involved are great, among them the question of tolls and the cost of provisioning of vessels at Canal Zone ports.

"It does seem that the State Department before attempting to deal with this subject should have conferred with congressional leaders concerning the purpose and effect of such policy. In the last analysis, the Congress is the ultimate authority and as such enacted the 1950 legislation and thereby bound the executive to comply with its provisions.

"The consequences of the tragic failures of the present administration since 1953 with regard to Panama Canal sovereignty and related questions reached a high point on November 3, 1959, in an attempted Panamanian mob invasion of the Canal Zone, undoubtedly of Communist inspiration, which was rightfully repelled by U.S. authorities. Instead of issuing a statement backing up the Governor of the Canal Zone to the hilt and warning agitators in Panama that further efforts to invade the zone would also be repelled by force if Panamanian authorities were unable or unwilling to hold radicals and their Communist sympathizers in check, the administration sent to the Isthmus a special diplomatic representative in an effort to appease those stirring up the trouble.

"As a further act of appeasement, he made the public statement that Panama retains 'titular sovereignty' over the Canal Zone, whatever that means. This statement was not satisfactory either to Panamanian or to U.S. executive authorities.

"However, he made no public statement commending the action of Governor Potter and zone military authorities in repelling the attempted November 3 invasion of the Canal Zone. Thus, the State Department continues its long-established, weak, and fatuous policy in dealing with Panama Canal problems.

"The crisis at Panama is focal and cannot be ignored. The disorders there on November 3, 1959, that required the use of force to protect U.S. interests also require that this incident be thoroughly looked into by a full-fledged congressional investigation to determine the facts and to place responsibility for the long series of policy failures preceding it. Succumbing to blackmail can only lead to greater extortions.

"For years the overall policy of our State Department has been appeasement; appeasement here, appeasement there, and appeasement everywhere—with the result that the most precious rights of our Nation are being liquidated everywhere while at the same time Communist aggression is permitted to flourish."

RELEASE OF TUESDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1959

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD, of Pennsylvania, today released the following statement concerning the policy of our State Department in dealing with Panama Canal problems:

"The significant disclosure in the press of Panama reporting Dr. Milton Eisenhower as having stated to a high Panamanian official and political leader that the United States would recognize Panamanian sovereignty over the Canal Zone has jolted all patriotic Americans and constrained the State Department to issue what has the appearance of a formal denial.

"The cleverly worded assertion by the State Department that Dr. Eisenhower did not make 'any statement which could be construed to commit the U.S. Government to any course of action' is misleading. It is not a forthright denial of the statement attributed to the brother of the President.

"The impression evidently intended was that Dr. Eisenhower's statement was being denied. However, instead of making a clear-cut denial of the alleged statement, the State Department's press release only declares that the United States is not bound thereby. Naturally, the U.S. Government cannot be bound by a statement of a private citizen even though he is the brother of the President and his former special representative during a good will tour of Latin America in mid-1958. And neither, I may add, can any official of our Government, whether in or out of the State Department, abrogate, surrender, or annul the solemn obligations of our treaties with other nations. Such action can only be taken by new treaty provisions ratified by and with the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate. Chaos would follow any other procedure.

"Moreover, the increasing of the muddle in Panama by controversy over what the President's brother has said is adding fuel to the flames of an ugly situation. The relations between Panama and the United States constitute a serious part of our deplorable international relationships because it is being used by forces allied with Russian Communists to create distrust and hatred between the peoples of the two countries, the latest incident being a second attempted mob 'invasion' of the Canal Zone on Saturday, November 28, 1959, and requiring the second use of force to protect the zone.

"At this stage of the Panama crisis nothing short of an assumption of authority by the Congress to control this matter will be a safe course for the United States. Since the State Department has made such a complete fiasco in its handling of isthmian matters, this question is raised: What are the influences that have been controlling, and still seem to be controlling, the State Department's actions?

"So far, it appears that the responsible U.S. authorities, in and out of the Canal Zone, including congressional leaders, have not had any voice in the attempted settlement of these grave questions. The State Department even fails and refuses to approve the wise and courageous actions of Canal Zone civil and military authorities in repelling the reckless and communistically inspired 'invasion' attempts on November 3 and 28.

"While the President exercises general authority in conducting our foreign relations, he must act within the framework and provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States, including treaties duly ratified by the Senate. Certainly, neither the State Department nor any of its underlings can bind our Government in contravention of express and important treaty provisions and legislative enactments, well illustrated by recent ill-advised pronouncements that can only serve to undermine both the 1903 treaty acquiring the Canal Zone and the act of 1950 placing the Panama Canal enterprise on a business basis. Yet in the instant situation it appears that both such attempts are being made.

"In dealing with Latin American affairs the State Department seems unable or unwilling to decide grave issues on the basis of merit but only on considerations of expediency and appeasement. It is indeed significant that Dr. Eisenhower, whose advice on Latin American matters has been described in the press of Panama as of 'dubious value,' has been appointed as a member of the newly created President's National Advisory Committee on Inter-American Affairs.

"The constant acts of appeasement and surrender through many years by our Department of State, especially at Panama where our huge 'giveaway' program started in 1936, well entitle that agency to be called the Department of Appeasement."

RELEASE OF THURSDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1959

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD, of Pennsylvania, today released the following statement concerning further threats of invasion of Panama:

"Recently reported preparations in Cuba for launching another invasion of the isthmus have caused Panama to make a formal protest to the Government of Cuba in an effort to ward off that danger.

"The present Cuban Government over a period of months, by both actions and words, has revealed itself as an agent of Moscow-directed international communism. Thus, any invasion of Panama by forces staged from Cuba would be an overt act in extension of the communistic system in this hemisphere and a matter of grave concern for the peace and safety of all the Americas.

"Moreover, it would not only violate the principle of nonintervention of the 1947 Rio Pact setting up the inter-American security system, but also the Monroe Doctrine.

"Our neighbors to the south recognize the dangers involved and look to the United States to lead in defense against current threats to the Western Hemisphere, with prompt announcement of the Monroe Doctrine as applying to any attempt from Cuba to invade Panama or other Latin American countries, especially those of the Caribbean area."

RELEASE OF SUNDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1959

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, in an open letter to President Eisenhower on the eve of the latter's departure on his worldwide "peace with justice" mission, vigorously assailed the administration's appeasement policy in connection with anti-American violence in the Panama Canal Zone.

FLOOD coupled his detailed and historically backed condemnation of the administration's soft Panama policy with a personal appeal to President Eisenhower "to apply the full force of your position toward safeguarding the U.S. interests in Panama—and, thereby, the entire world."

The Pennsylvania Congressman, who is widely recognized as an outstanding spokesman for the full protection of American rights in Panama, as guaranteed "in perpetuity" in a treaty between the two nations, made the open letter appeal to President Eisenhower, he stated, because of the views expressed by the Chief Executive at his press conference on last Thursday.

Because of the imminent departure of the President, FLOOD had his communication on the problem hand delivered to the White House Thursday evening. FLOOD wrote that all the circumstances warranted, he felt, embracing his views in an open letter to the Chief Executive.

Remarking that "the Panama Canal has long been a prime target for Communist political attack, dating back to the 1917 Russian revolution," Congressman FLOOD cited the "disturbing disorders" that have taken place in recent weeks in Panama.

"There has been a virtual blackout of important news from the isthmus in the major press of the United States in line with the desire expressed by you soon after the event to minimize the significance of the incident 'as one episode in a long period of favorable relations.'

"As to this, Mr. President," FLOOD wrote, "the Spanish language press of Panama has not missed the significance of these disorders. Neither have residents in the Canal Zone nor thoughtful nonpolitical Panamanians who witnessed the assaults endured by our Canal Zone police and Army units in protecting U.S. interests."

FLOOD was frankly critical of the Eisenhower administration's handling of the violence-marked situation which developed in the wake of recent anti-American demonstrations in the Canal Zone.

"Instead of a prompt and courageous announcement backing up Canal Zone authorities, civil and military, to the hilt and warning that further efforts to invade the zone would be repelled by force if Panamanian authorities were unable or unwilling to hold radicals and their Communist monitors in check," FLOOD wrote, "the administration sent a diplomatic emissary to appease those stirring up the trouble. The result was inevitable; a second attempt to invade the Canal Zone on November 28, with far greater numbers involved and renewed violence."

The Pennsylvania legislator, who is directly concerned with Panama affairs as a member of the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee with responsibility for supply purposes for Panama, then boldly charged the Eisenhower administration with a serious error of omissions, policywise.

"It is indeed regrettable that neither you nor any official in the State Department has publicly commended Canal Zone or U.S. Army authorities for doing their duty. They have, however, commended the National Guard of Panama and issued statements foretelling appeasement to mobsters whose ultimate aim is nationalization."

Continuing in this vein, FLOOD wrote:

"Not only have your statements, Mr. President, served to undermine important provisions of the 1903 treaty acquiring the Canal Zone and providing for the construction of the Panama Canal and its operation, but also to negate the 1950 act of Congress placing the canal enterprise on a self-sustaining and businesslike basis. These are matters in which Congress has a prime interest and responsibility."

FLOOD struck hard at the administration's suggestion for admitting the display of the Panama flag in the Canal Zone, asserting it would be a "psychological Pearl Harbor." Continuing, FLOOD claimed: "Furthermore, if the Panama flag ever flies officially in the Canal Zone, this will open up a veritable Pandora's box of controversy, conflict, and chaos. The extremists who have been inciting Panamanian mobs to violence and have thus been establishing the foreign policy of Panama have as their immediate aim a duality of control which the great leaders at the start of the century thought had been forever prevented. The ultimate aim is Panamanian nationalization."

Earlier in the year, FLOOD charged the efforts of Panamanians to nationalize the canal, if successful, would "Berlinize the Canal Zone and thus be a dagger thrust at the heart of America."

In his letter to the President, FLOOD further stated:

"The acquisition of the Canal Zone in 1904 and undertaking the Panama Canal enterprise are highlights in American history, always looked upon by President Theodore Roosevelt as comparable in importance to the Louisiana Purchase. The policies leading up to them flowed from the minds of such eminent leaders as Secretary of State Hay, Senator Spooner, John Bassett Moore, Elihu Root, Adm. John G. Walker, John F. Stevens, and William H. Taft, as well as Roosevelt; and fully confirmed by Secretary of State Hughes.

"The treaty provisions for exclusive sovereign control of the Canal Zone in perpetuity to the entire exclusion of the exercise of any sovereign control by the Republic of Panama were based on realistic considerations involved in the conduct of a great project in an area of endemic revolution, and political instability. The perpetuity requirement is based on 1902 recommendations of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the Spooner Act."

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 3, 1959.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This letter is motivated by the fact that I am a Representative in the Congress from the great State of Pennsylvania and a member of the Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations charged with the duty of formulating supply bills for Panama Canal purposes; and by the further fact that the discharge of the duties thus imposed has caused me to become a close student of canal problems. These are the reasons for thus addressing you concerning your statements in the Presidential news conference of December 2, 1959, relative to Panama Canal matters.

My feeling in the present situation is one of the deepest concern, and therefore I speak frankly, but, I assure you, with the respect due your office and person. Also, because of the circumstances and your absence from the country, I take the liberty of making this an open letter for the reason that thereby—in some measure at least—the American people and the Congress may be warned of the dangers involved in the current situation at Panama. I am in nowise an enemy of Panama or of any just Panamanian aspirations.

The acquisition of the Canal Zone in 1904 and undertaking the Panama Canal enterprise are highlights in American history, always looked upon by President Theodore Roosevelt as comparable in importance to the Louisiana Purchase. The policies leading to them flowed from the minds of such eminent leaders as Secretary of State Hay, Senator Spooner, John Bassett Moore, Elihu Root, Adm. John G. Walker, John F. Stevens, and William H. Taft, as well as Roosevelt; and fully confirmed by Secretary of State Hughes.

The treaty provisions for exclusive sovereign control of the Canal Zone in perpetuity to the entire exclusion of the exercise of any sovereign control by the Republic of Panama were based on realistic considerations involved in the conduct of a great project in an area of endemic revolution, and political instability. The perpetuity requirement is based on 1902 recommendations of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the Spooner Act.

DECEMBER 3, 1959.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The record of violence, revolution, political intrigue, and instability in Panama since 1904, culminating in the attempted mob invasions of the Canal Zone on November 3 and 28, 1959, are ample proof of the wisdom and vision of those who framed our historic policy of exclusive sovereign control, both Americans and Panamanians. Nothing could be more fatal to the welfare of Panama than for the Canal Zone or canal to become Panamanian political footballs.

While it is true that the preamble of the 1903 treaty acquiring the grant of the Canal Zone in perpetuity describes "the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama," this statement was obviously made to show the transfer of sovereignty over the area from Colombia to Panama as a result of the secession of Panama from Colombia. It was not for the purpose of establishing the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone after ratification of the treaty. Thus, for you as President to state that the United States "has recognized the titular sovereignty of Panama" over the Canal Zone for more than 50 years is not only inaccurate but definitely misleading. In addition, for you also to suggest that there should be "visual evidence that Panama does have titular sovereignty over the region" is incredible. It plays directly into the hands of those whose ultimate aim is wresting control of the Panama Canal from the United States.

The only possible claim that Panama can justly make is one of reversionary character that can never be exercised so long as the United States meets its treaty obligations with respect to the canal. Therefore, the Canal Zone is constitutionally acquired domain of the United States subject only to treaty provisions.

What has been most disturbing since the disorders of November 3, 1959, has been the virtual blackout of important news from the isthmus in the major press of the United States in line with the desire expressed by you soon after that event to minimize the significance of the incident as "one episode in a long period of favorable relations." As to this, Mr. President, the Spanish language press of Panama has not missed the significance of those disorders. Neither have residents in the Canal Zone nor thoughtful nonpolitical Panamanians who witnessed the assaults endured by our Canal Zone police and Army units in protecting the United States interests.

Instead of a prompt and courageous announcement backing up Canal Zone authorities, civil and military, to the hilt and warning that further efforts to invade the zone would also be repelled by force if Panamanian authorities were unable or unwilling to hold radicals and their Communist monitors in check, the administration sent a diplomatic emissary to appease those stirring up the trouble. The result was inevitable: a second attempt to invade the Canal Zone on November 28, with far greater numbers involved and renewed violence.

DECEMBER 3, 1959.

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is indeed regrettable that neither yourself nor any official in the State Department has publicly commended Canal Zone or U.S. Army authorities for doing their duty. They have, however, commended the National Guard of Panama and issued statements foretelling appeasement to mobsters whose ultimate aim is nationalization.

Not only have your statements, Mr. President, served to undermine important provisions of the 1903 treaty acquiring the Canal Zone and providing for construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual operation, but also to negate the 1950 act of Congress placing the canal enterprise on a self-sustaining and businesslike basis. These are matters in which the Congress has prime interest and responsibility.

In this connection, please do not overlook that the Panama Canal has long been a prime target for Communist political attack, dating back to the 1917 Russian revolution.

As to the State Department's reputed statement that the "admission of the Panamanian flag into the zone" would be of "immense psychological importance," that is true. It would certainly be a psychological "Pearl Harbor" for the United States. Furthermore, if the Panama flag ever flies officially in the Canal Zone, this will open up a veritable Pandora's box of controversy, conflict, and chaos. The extremists who have been inciting Panamanian mobs to violence and have thus been establishing the foreign policy of Panama have as their immediate aim a duality of control which the great leaders at the start of the century thought had been forever prevented. The ultimate aim is Panamanian nationalization.

Concession after concession in the nature of important benefits has been made to Panama by way of appeasement and the most solemn and paramount rights of the United States surrendered without any balancing considerations while your recent statements on these matters have been made in a further effort to appease—and doubtless from recommendations of underlings in the State Department or others not grounded in the Panama situation—no action has been required of Panama to make any withdrawal of its recent enactment seeking to extend its territorial waters around the Canal Zone, thus making the canal another Berlin. In fact, all these concessions have produced an adverse effect so far as the United States is concerned.

The succession of surrenders over many years of vastly important indispensable American rights to operate the Panama Canal for the benefit of the world at large is a matter of the gravest concern. We must stand by our treaty obligations and not permit this great interocean link to become the victim of Panamanian or any other political maneuvering.

DECEMBER 3, 1959.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The flying in the Canal Zone of the Panamanian flag would symbolize another striking instance of the liquidation of the just authority of our Nation, while Communist aggression so largely responsible for the liquidation has been permitted to flourish in a manner far beyond any precedent of history.

The tragic muddle at Panama, Mr. President, is conclusive evidence that you cannot safely rely on those who since 1953 have been advising you on Panama Canal sovereignty and treaty questions. The whole policy has been one of sheer appeasement, and evidently, against the views and recommendations of those in immediate charge of the operation, maintenance, and protection of the canal. However overgenerous some of the recent concessions might have been, they are far better than any action which would impair or subtract from the full authority of the United States over the Canal Zone. Without such authority this Nation could not discharge its obligations in operating the canal.

The official display of the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone as evidence of Panamanian jurisdiction is not an insignificant gesture of good will. Instead, it will pave the way for ever-increasing and impossible demands in behalf of Panama led by extremist radicals who under no circumstances will ever be friends of the United States regardless of what we may do.

Finally, I can think of nothing that would have a stronger appeal to the people of our country than for you to apply the full force of your prestige toward safeguarding United States interests in Panama—and, thereby, the entire world. If you should thus act, our people will support you in the best tradition.

With best for yourself and the cause of peace on the forthcoming trip to the Old World, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Member of Congress.

RELEASE OF FRIDAY, JANUARY 8, 1960

Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD today called upon Secretary of State Christian A. Herter to make a forthright statement supporting the sovereign position of the United States in the Panama Canal Zone and in the operation of the canal, both of which have been targets in recent months of radical elements in Panama whose purpose is to oust the United States from this part of the world or, at least, to make impossible demands upon this country with regard to annuity payments and other matters.

FLOOD has contended for several years in speeches before the House that the United States will continue to face serious difficulties at Panama so long as an appeasement policy is followed by those whose responsibility it is to establish policy with regard to United States-Panama relations in general and the Canal Zone in particular.

Developments in recent months have borne out the Congressman's concern in this matter, with two outbreaks, led by revolutionary mobs, in November, and the prospect of further violence if these same groups do not obtain their ill-considered demands, including the flying of the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone, in the near future.

FLOOD stated in a communication with Secretary Herter that titular sovereignty does not mean joint or equal sovereignty by Panama over the Canal Zone nor does it express the precise situation involved, the term "titular sovereignty" recently being enunciated at Panama by a U.S. State Department official following the November outbreaks and was his way of describing Panama's position vis-a-vis the United States in the Canal Zone. FLOOD said at the time that this State Department official did not serve the best interests of the United States in making such a characterization of Panama's position and the position, established by a 1903 treaty, of the United States in the Canal Zone and in the operation of the canal.

Continuing, FLOOD told Herter that so long as the United States maintains and operates the Panama Canal in accordance with its treaty obligations, Panama cannot rightfully exercise any kind of sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

On the flag matter, FLOOD stated the official display of the Panama flag over Canal Zone territory as an evidence of any kind of Panamanian sovereignty, "would only complicate the situation and would be the basis for further and ever-increasing and impossible demands on the part of Panama with respect to both the Canal Zone and the Panama Canal."

"The radical elements in Panama which, in fact, formulate its foreign policy, would never rest with such display, whatever agreement might be formally reached between the United States and Panama on this subject," FLOOD stated to Herter.

Such a display of the Panamanian flag in the Canal Zone, FLOOD continued, "would inevitably add to tasks in the operating and defense forces of the Panama Canal" and, he stated, "any person entertaining a contrary view, in the light of isthmian history is absolutely naive."

In conclusion, FLOOD said that he strongly believed that a forthright statement by our Government on this subject in harmony with the enunciations of former Secretaries of State, including John Hay and Charles Evans Hughes, as well as President-elect William Howard Taft, to name a few, "would do much to clarify the situation and to restrain communistic and radical elements in Panama whose ultimate goal is nationalization at whatsoever cost."

FLOOD also posed these questions to Herter:

Why feed the dangerous flames of fanaticism with unwise appeasements, which in the last analysis would be a vast disservice to both Panama and the United States?

Why should we fail to stand up for our just, legitimate, and indispensable rights and authority in the Canal Zone?

FLOOD announced that he will make another in his long series of addresses on this subject before the House of Representatives the week of January 11.

The title of his address will be: "Panama Canal: Symbol of Fourth Front."

FLOOD's continuing interest in the U.S. position at Panama is heightened by his membership on the House Appropriations Committee and that committee's responsibility in providing supply bills and other necessary funds for the operation and maintenance of the canal and the Canal Zone.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 33

Whereas there is now being strongly urged in certain quarters of the world the surrender, by the United States, without reimbursement, of the Panama Canal, to the United Nations or to some other international organization for the ownership and operation of the canal; and

Whereas the United States, at the expense of its taxpayers and under, and fully relying on, treaty agreements, constructed the canal, and since its completion, at large expenditure, has maintained and operated it and provided for its protection and defense; and

Whereas the United States, following the construction of the canal, has since maintained, operated, and protected it in strict conformity with treaty requirements and agreements, and has thus made it free, without restriction or qualification, for the shipping of the entire world; and, in consequence of which, with respect to the canal and the Canal Zone, every just and equitable consideration favors the continuance of the United States in the exercise of all the rights and authority by treaty provided, and in the discharge of the duties by treaty imposed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That (1) it is the sense and judgment of the Congress that the United States should not, in any wise, surrender to any other government or authority its jurisdiction over, and control of, the Canal Zone, and its ownership, control, management, maintenance, operation, and protection of the Panama Canal, in accordance with existing treaty provisions; and that (2) it is to the best interests—not only of the United States, but, as well, of all nations and peoples—that all the powers, duties, authority, and obligations of the United States in the premises be continued in accordance with existing treaty provisions.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 445

Whereas the subversive forces known as international communism, operating secretly and openly, directly and indirectly, threaten the sovereignty and political independence of all the Western Hemisphere nations; and

Whereas the American continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, are not subject to colonization or domination by any power; and

Whereas the intervention of international communism, directly or indirectly, or however disguised, in any American state, conflicts with the established policy of the American Republics for the protection of the sovereignty of the peoples of such states and the political independence of their governments; and

Whereas such a situation extended to any portions of the Western Hemisphere is dangerous to the peace and safety of the whole of it, including the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), (1) That any such subversive domination or threat of it violates the principles of the Monroe Doctrine. and of collective security as set forth in the acts and resolutions heretofore adopted by the American Republics; and

(2) That in any such situation any one or more of the high contracting parties to the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance may, in the exercise of individual or collective self-defense, and in accordance with the declarations and principles above stated, take steps to forestall or combat intervention, domination, control, and colonization in whatever form, by the subversive forces known as international communism and its agencies in the Western Hemisphere.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 450

Whereas the United States, under the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 with Panama, acquired complete and exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone in perpetuity for construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection; and

Whereas all jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama over the Canal Zone ceased on exchange of ratifications of the 1903 treaty on February 26, 1904; and

Whereas since that time the United States has continuously exercised exclusive sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone and Panama Canal; and

Whereas where responsibility is imposed there must be given for its effectuation adequate authority; and with respect to the Panama Canal the treaty of 1903 so provided; and

Whereas the United States has fully and effectively discharged all its treaty obligations with respect to the Panama Canal and the only legitimate interest that Panama can have in the sovereignty of the Canal Zone is one of reversionary character that can never become operative unless the United States should abandon the canal enterprise; and

Whereas the policy of the United States since President Hayes' message to the Congress on March 8, 1880, has been for an interoceanic canal "under American control," that is to say, under the control of the United States; and

Whereas the grant by Panama to the United States of exclusive sovereignty over the Canal Zone for the aforesaid purposes was an absolute, indispensable condition precedent to the great task undertaken by the United States in the construction and perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the Panama Canal, for the benefit of the entire world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), (1) That the United States, under treaty provisions, constitutionally acquired, and holds, in perpetuity, exclusive sovereignty and control over the Canal Zone for the construction of the Panama Canal and its perpetual maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection; and

(2) That there can be no just claim by the Republic of Panama for the exercise of any sovereignty of whatever character over the Canal Zone so long as the United States discharges its duties and obligations with respect to the canal; and

(3) That the formal display of any official flag over the Canal Zone other than that of the United States is violative of law, treaty, international usage, and the historic canal policy of the United States as fully upheld by its highest courts and administrative officials; and would lead to confusion and chaos in the administration of the Panama Canal enterprise.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House who wish to do so may extend their remarks on this subject at the end of the other insertions made on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

DR. TOWNSEND'S 93D BIRTHDAY

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 93d birthday anniversary of a distinguished American who has for many years been in the forefront of the fight for economic justice and security for the millions of senior citizens of this Nation. I refer to Dr. Francis E. Townsend, founder and president of the Townsend plan.

Dr. Townsend was born on January 13, 1867, in Fairbury, Ill., the son of George Warren Townsend and Sarah Harper Townsend. He graduated from Franklin, Nebr., Academy in 1893 and received his medical degree from Omaha Medical College of the University of Nebraska in 1903.

He married the former Mrs. Minnie Bogue in 1906 and became the father of three children, the eldest of whom is Robert, long associated with his father in Townsend plan activities and who now serves as vice president and treasurer of the Townsend organization.

Dr. Townsend practiced medicine in South Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana, also serving as a 1st lieutenant in the Medical Corps during World War I. Following the war, he moved his practice to Long Beach, Calif. Here he served as assistant health officer of the city of Long Beach and devoted much of his time to caring for the indigent. For more than a generation he has been a vigorous advocate of the Townsend plan to provide decent pensions to all persons at age 60.

Throughout his life, Dr. Townsend has been the champion of the sick, the disabled, the underprivileged, and the economically distressed persons in our midst. It is a pleasure to salute this great American humanitarian on this, his 93d birthday.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of a more difficult position for a Member of this House to be placed in than to have to follow the distinguished and able gentleman from Pennsylvania in the presentation of any point of view on the floor of this House.

Incidentally, the very able and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just disclosed his broad knowledge and ability in the field of foreign affairs as it relates to the Panama Canal and the Republic of Panama, it also happens is one of the leading forces on the subject on which I am about to talk to you for a few moments; and I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be here for at least part of this period so that we can have the advice and the recommendation which I know he is so well qualified to give.

SCHENECTADY UNEMPLOYMENT HEARINGS DEMONSTRATE URGENT NEED FOR PASSING DISTRESSED AREAS BILL

Mr. Speaker, last September when the 1st session of the 86th Congress adjourned, one of the most important items of unfinished business left on our agenda was the so-called area redevelopment bill or the distressed areas bill, of which I am proud to be a sponsor. This bill is designed to deal with the urgent and pressing problem of chronic unemployment that has plagued so many sections of our country even at a time when we are being told as the President of the United States said again in his state of the Union message, that the Nation is experiencing the greatest prosperity in its history. Mr. Speaker, for millions of people in many sections across the country, including my own congressional district in New York State, there is no prosperity; there is instead the specter of unemployment, uncertainty, the loss of jobs, and general economic demoralization.

Although the area redevelopment bill pased the other body in the last session and also was favorably reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency of this body, it has remained in the Committee on Rules without further action being taken. Fortunately, just before the adjournment of Congress last year the other body created a special committee to look into the whole subject of unemployment. That committee was appointed under the chairmanship of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, a former Member of this body, Senator EUGENE MCCARTHY. In the months that have passed since the first session of Congress ended, Senator MCCARTHY and his colleagues have gone from one section of the country to another examining the areas of unemployment and of underemployment, and under the terms of the resolution creating their committee they are now scheduled to make a full report to the other body, together with their recommendations for appropriate corrective legislation, on January 31.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to try to jump the gun on the official report which will be submitted by the distinguished McCarthy committee. But last Friday this committee came into my own district in New York State and into my own home city of Schenectady and held a day-long hearing there into the problem of unemployment in our particular area. And on the basis of that hearing and the information developed there, Mr. Speaker, I would like to urge all of the Members of this body to join with me in insisting that the House of Representatives move quickly to get action on the area redevelopment bill so that we may demonstrate conclusively that this Congress has at least as much concern for the problems of unemployed areas on this continent that it has for unemployment areas and underdeveloped areas thousands of miles away on other continents.

I believe that the distressed areas bill is one of the most urgent pieces of legislation that we could possibly adopt, and I believe that the information which was developed at the hearing in Schenectady last Friday, which no doubt duplicates in many ways information picked up in many other parts of the United States during the course of this committee's inquiry, makes it clear why this legislation is so important.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that in Schenectady the committee went into one of the old and established industrial sections of the United States. Schenectady itself is the home of one of America's largest and most powerful corporations, the General Electric Co. Within a few miles is located the great city of Amsterdam, the center for many years of the carpet industry in the United States, and just to the north of Amsterdam lie the cities of Gloversville and Johnstown, the center of the great glove-making industry in this country. Today, Mr. Speaker, throughout this area, the picture, as these hearings developed, is a bleak one. Schenectady, this great home of one of America's greatest corporations, is suffering heavily from unemployment, although through a fluke in the statistical reporting methods it has just been removed from the list of areas of most serious unemployment. Believe me, as the testimony developed at this hearing, the situation in Schenectady has not improved; only this morning in the Schenectady Gazette I read a report that even more people are expected to be dropped from the employment rolls at the Schenectady plant of the Alco Products Co., Inc. In fact, the situation is likely to get worse before it gets better. In addition, Amsterdam, Gloversville, and Johnstown are all currently listed as areas of chronic unemployment. In fact, these two areas are the two areas in New York State which have the very dubious distinction of being so designated.

Now what is the cause of this situation in Schenectady? Well, according to information presented at the hearing by a representative of the General Electric Co. our area is still suffering from a recession. This recession was not referred to as in the past but actually in the present. In fact, based on the testimony presented to the committee, I gather that there is some question, at least, as far as the whole electrical industry is concerned, whether the recession of 1957 and 1958 has even now come to an end. Certainly it has not come to an end in our area, and the great manufacturing plant of the General Electric Co. in Schenectady is today operating at something between 40 and 60 percent of its normal productive capacity. In addition, the situation has been further complicated by the fact that the company over the past few years has gradually been moving many of its operations out of the established industrial area of New York State into the areas of the South and the West.

The committee was given these facts with regard to the resulting local employment situation. During the past 5-year period, while overall employment in the United States was rising from 61.2 million to 65.5 million, employment in the city of Schenectady dropped from 46,192 to 23,520, or, in other words, a drop of 22,672, or nearly 50 percent of the working force. In fact, the committee was informed that it now takes almost 17 years of service in the General Electric Co. to qualify even for a sweeper's job. The same kind of a shift has also been taking place with regard to the other large industry in Schenectady, the Alco Products Co.

These shifts have had a devastating effect, as can be imagined, on the community itself. As Rabbi Solomon S. Bernards put it in his testimony:

> Imperceptible at first but traceable now, a spirit of demoralization began to set in in our community about 3 or 4 years ago.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have received great help from Members on both sides of the aisle on this area redevelopment plan. It, too, is completely nonpartisan. Men on both sides of the aisle have worked for years to make this law. I must say that the gentleman now speaking to us from the well joined this fight the day he came to the House. He has been at my right hand ever since. At all of our steering committee meetings, caucus meetings, and debate and what not he has been my strong right arm. I am proud to report that to the people of his district, which is equally distressed economically as is mine in the anthracite coalfields of Pennsylvania. Now, I anticipate what my friend is going to say. I know he is going to cover all of the problems that have been discussed with my colleagues both on the right and the left from States who have this same problem. I am sorry I cannot remain here, because I am an hour late for the Defense Appropriation Subcommittee hearing. The Secretary is testifying. I think you would like to know that I have talked about this matter with my friends on both sides of the aisle, and I am going to try again. I went to the Speaker and asked his cooperation and help. He assured me he wants this kind of a law and that he will help us in any way he can to have this law and that he will program it immediately if and when it reaches the floor of the House from the Committee on Rules. I know he wants to help us, and I am sure that makes my friend who is speaking feel much, much better about that. I feel that we have the votes in the House to pass this bill, and I believe we will pass the bill. The administration has a bill of its own. I do not say there is anything sacred about my bill. I will stand by, listening to the rule of reason and compromise, because you know that settlement is better than any lawsuit, anyhow. So, I congratulate you for taking this time. I see many friends here to help you, and I wish you would excuse me.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his comments and very generous remarks. As is ever the case, the gentleman has been more than generous in his words for me. Let me say that it has been a real privilege for me to be one of the many followers of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his very able fight in this regard. I am delighted to know that he has had these assurances, and I feel certain on the basis of information developed by the committee in the other body that we will muster the votes needed to put this bill across. I must also say that I was pleased to read in the paper the other day a report that I interpreted as being a statement from the President of the United States that he was now prepared to support some legislation of this type, although in his form rather than our form, as the gentleman indicated. I think this is certainly a significant advance and it makes me very optimistic about the future. And, I agree with the gentleman that we certainly want to get a bill out in one form or another and will be prepared to make any reasonable and proper compromise. I will go along with the gentleman's leadership on that.

Mr. Speaker, in these Schenectady hearings, the mayor of the city of Schenectady joined in expressing regret for the effect which these movements of industry have had on our city, particularly when they have come at a time when the country as a whole was experiencing a general economic drop.

Two additional points: Testimony at the hearing developed the fact that foreign competition has been an increasingly severe factor to be reckoned with in the electrical industry; and the vice president of the Alco Products Co. further testified frankly that the only way to improve the situation was to increase productivity, which he acknowledged would mean even fewer men required to build the same number of locomotives.

In spite of these difficulties, Mr. Speaker, the people of Schenectady are making an almost superhuman effort to help themselves. Within recent months there has been established a citywide organization, which has called upon leaders in every phase of community life, government, business, labor, the church, and so on, to mount a communitywide effort to attract new industry and to create the conditions under which new industry can be brought into the community and in which a greater number of jobs can be found for existing industry. This great community organization, which has already received nationwide attention, is known, rather uniquely but succinctly, as GUTS, Inc. I am myself proud to be a member of the GUTS organization; in fact I am in charge of the sales organization designed to sell my home community to prospective industrial applicants, and I will be happy to meet at the conclusion of these remarks with any of you or any of your constituents who may desire to move into our area.

I am certain that this kind of action is one of the first steps that is necessary before a community can arrest the downward trend. But I also feel that we should not allow these local activities to blind us to the fact that what we are confronted with here is not just a local but a national problem and we cannot escape the responsibility for dealing with it as a national problem, too.

In the city of Amsterdam, once one of the textile centers of the Nation, there is the same basic problem. Some years ago the Bigelow Sanford Carpet Co., one of the big employers in Amsterdam, moved to the South. As a result, textile employment in Amsterdam, which stood at 15,600 in 1951, is now down to 8,600, according to testimony presented to the committee. A former mayor of the city of Amsterdam testified that this move was undertaken because of low wages and cheaper power in the Southern States of our Nation and also because of the difficulty which unions have found in organizing to protect the wages and working conditions of their members in that section of our country. Today Amsterdam is listed as suffering from 13.5 percent of unemployment, and this in spite of the fact that this great community has also mobilized its resources in an effort to attract new industry.

Comparatively speaking, this organization, known as Industries for Amsterdam, has been highly successful, having attracted some 19 new plants into the city of Amsterdam in the past 6 or 7 years. And yet, at best, as the testimony demonstrated, this community self-help effort had brought in less than half of the 4,000 jobs that moved out of the city of Amsterdam when the Bigelow Sanford plant went south. In spite of the fact that this community self-help spirit in Amsterdam resulted, as the present mayor of the city testified, in the raising of some $400,000 from its own citizens to support this new industries' drive and to construct needed industrial plants, the problem has not been licked. In fact, the community, as the mayor himself expressed it, needs outside help. He testified to the Senate committee that the city has industrial prospects interested in moving in but help is needed to build plants to accommodate these prospects.

As the Amsterdam Recorder phrased it in an editorial:

> We need help. What we need is assistance in making our community attractive to outside industry in search of new locations.

Even more seriously hit is the glove industry in Fulton County just to the north. For many years the glove industry has been affected by foreign competition. In the past 5 or 6 years this competition from abroad has reached staggering and frightening proportions. Today Gloversville has 21.3 percent unemployment, with some 5,000 of its 23,450 people unemployed. It is listed as a chronic area of unemployment, and one witness testified that at best the workers in the glove industry average only 7 or 8 months out of a year of employment. The rest of the time they subsist on unemployment insurance. As the mayor of the city of Gloversville testified, retail sales in this community have gone down 7 percent in the past year while retail sales in the rest of the Nation have been rising by 8 percent. This is what we mean, Mr. Speaker, by chronic unemployment. In fact the size of this economic problem of foreign competition can perhaps best be appreciated by the testimony which indicated that 70 percent of the knit glove manufacturing put onto the American market today comes in from Japan. As a result of this situation the glove industry is scheduled to appear before the Tariff Commission on Tuesday next to appeal for substantial relief. As one witness testified to the Senate committee, "The glove industry in Fulton County has come to the very last phase of its erosion, and now, unless the practice is reversed, the last remnants will disappear." Referring to the Nation's "unrealistic tariff policies," the executive secretary of the National Association of Leather Glove Manufacturers said bluntly:

> The county of Fulton is powerless to restore healthy employment.

He added:

> More than kind words are needed to help the area.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the situation in one important area of this country. I am sure that other Members of this body could cite statistics and conditions to demonstrate that it can be duplicated in many other parts of the country, and I am sure that the report of the distinguished committee from the other body will also demonstrate this fact clearly. Unemployment is more than an economic problem, Mr. Speaker. As several witnesses indicated it is also a social and an educational problem. Desertion and marital discord are on the rise in areas of increasing unemployment. Young men and women are in many cases dropping out of school early in order to try to find a job to help the family tide over their economic situation, and many youngsters who have been educated at substantial cost by the community are leaving the community and moving elsewhere, thus depriving the community of the investment in their education and development for which they had contributed so heavily. Even more serious are the prospects for the future. Not only are we unable to supply the jobs for the young people who are looking for them today, but what about the opportunities for those increased numbers of young men and women who will be coming into the labor market in the next few years as a result of the so-called population explosion which we have been hearing so much about? Are these people permanently to be denied employment? Are we to close down areas of our own country and mark them permanently as contaminated and unfit for human habitation and too hot to handle because of our inability to develop jobs in these locations? Are we to leave our country splotched and blotted with ghost towns from one end to the other in a time of national prosperity?

Mr. Speaker, this problem is not just a local problem. I submit that it is clearly a national problem. President Eisenhower, in his state of the Union message the other day, said that he would not recommend the expenditure of Federal funds for any local problems but only for those of national concern. Mr. Speaker, a cancer in one part of the body can ultimately destroy all of the body, and in my judgment the economic cancer of unemployment in one area of the country can ultimately damage the economic fabric of the country as a whole. This is a national problem, and I believe that we must move swiftly and decisively to deal with it on a national basis. We cannot possibly take pride in our prosperity as long as this level of unemployment is allowed to exist in so many parts of the Nation.

One of the most disturbing factors of all about this situation is the comparison between this country and countries abroad which have been the beneficiaries in the past few years of so much financial aid from the United States. As one of the members of the subcommittee put it, there is a level of unemployment in this country of 6 percent. One of the witnesses testified that he would consider the reduction of this level to even 3 percent as highly favorable. By comparison, the level of unemployment in countries of Western Europe, which have been heavy beneficiaries of American aid is well below 2 percent. Can we not do as well for our own people as we do for those abroad?

The representative of the General Electric Co. for example, testifying before the committee, pointed out how contracts in the heavy electrical goods industry awarded in just the past year to foreign firms had meant the loss of over a thousand jobs for a full year in the city of Schenectady alone. In fact, this representative, Mr. A. C. Stevens, was concerned not only with the problem of foreign competition but the even more serious problem that to meet this demand industry may gradually be forced to move abroad in order to stay competitive, thereby taking away even the small number of jobs that still remain. Indeed this movement has already started in many of our industries and especially in glove industry, and as Mr. Stevens himself phrased it, there is substantial danger that this movement may turn into a full-scale "stampede."

Mr. Speaker, this is the shape of the problem we face. Even though the people in my district are brave people and are deeply optimistic, and even though they have done everything possible to assist themselves, it is clear, as this hearing brought out, that they desperately need help from the outside. They need help to help themselves. They need help to attract new industries into their area and to provide these new industries with facilities that would make their established community an industrially attractive one. They need help to counteract some of the concessions that are being offered by local governments in other areas of the country. They need help to retrain workers from skills that have been established over many years to new skills that would be needed for new industries, a job which very few industrialists are prepared to undertake and finance themselves.

There are many other pieces of legislation that, in my judgment, are required to deal fully with this problem in all of its aspects, including, as I have already indicated, legislation to meet the serious problem of foreign trade and our unrealistic tariff policy. But the first and most important step in my judgment would be the adoption of the bill which already has passed the other body and which has received the overwhelming support of the Committee on Banking and Currency in this body, a bill, in fact, which passed both Houses of Congress in the 85th Congress and then unfortunately was vetoed by the President of the United States, the area redevelopment bill. This bill would make funds available to communities like Schenectady and Amsterdam and Gloversville and Johnstown which are already moving to help themselves by establishing community industrial development organizations. It would make funds available to retrain workers from one type of productive activity to another. It would help to build the industrial buildings that the mayor of Amsterdam has said his community needs if it is going to lick its own chronic unemployment problem.

I want to appeal to all of the Members of this body to join with me to get this bill out of the Rules Committee and onto the floor of this House. I believe there were indications at the end of the last Congress that a new effort would be made early in this session to accomplish just this objective. Now is the time to act. And I was most encouraged, Mr. Speaker, just the other day, to read a press account which indicated that even the President of the United States and the Vice President of the United States have expressed their desire to support this kind of distressed-areas legislation. There may be some quibbling over the amount of money, but I do not see how there can be any quibble over the need for action at the highest level of Government to eliminate this economic cancer and to recognize our responsibility to restore the economic health of our own people, especially if we can so easily provide billions of dollars for unemployed and underdeveloped countries abroad.

If a visit to these foreign countries can so move people that they recognize that the challenge of poverty and lack of opportunity is a titantic challenge, as the President of the United States indicated just the other day, then I think there is an equally titanic challenge for us to meet in the problem of lost opportunities, of failure to utilize our full resources, of poverty and economic stress in our own country.

"Look homeward, angel." Let us not lose sight of the responsibilities and the needs in our own community and our own Nation as we meet the needs of world leadership abroad. Let us not sacrifice our own economic health in trying to restore the health of our friends abroad. Let us not take away our own jobs as we try to create jobs in other countries.

I believe the area redevelopment bill is the first and necessary step in facing up to this serious and threatening problem of unemployment here at home, and I hope those Members of this House on both sides of the aisle who worked together in the last year under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], will join together again this year to produce a piece of legislation that will move to meet what in my judgment is the Nation's gravest economic threat.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include following these remarks testimony which I presented before the Special Committee on Unemployment Problems of the other body, and also to include following that an extension of remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] who has asked that his remarks on this subject be included in the RECORD following my own.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Without objection, the several requests are granted.

There was no objection.

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN SAMUEL S. STRATTON BEFORE U.S. SENATE COMMITTEE ON UNEMPLOYMENT, SCHENECTADY, N.Y., JANUARY 8, 1960

Mr. Chairman members of the committee, I want to extend first my appreciation to the committee for accepting the invitation which I extended to the committee, with the support of the Schenectady Board of Supervisors and local No. 301 of the International Union of Electrical Workers, to include a study of the conditions in Schenectady and the Mohawk Valley area in your survey of the overall national unemployment problem.

I believe your appearance here today is of great importance. Many of the problems of unemployment, after all, are particularly well exemplified by conditions that exist in the established industrial areas of the Northeast. During the course of your hearings you have collected a great deal of evidence. No doubt many of the facts that you will learn of here will duplicate information which you have obtained elsewhere. But I also believe that you will find certain features of our local situation which may be somewhat unique and which will help to amplify the reasons for the painful and paradoxical economic distress that is occurring in the midst of apparent prosperity in other parts of our Nation.

For your purposes, the 32d Congressional District can be divided roughly into two sections. First, the situation in Schenectady growing out of the activities of the General Electric Co. and to a lesser extent the Alco Products Co. Secondly, the situation in areas like Amsterdam and Fulton County where the depressing impact of foreign imports has been especially significant.

Schenectady has long been one of the great industrial centers of the State and the Nation. This, of course, is the home of the great General Electric Co. At the peak of the Korean war, 7 years ago, some 40,000 persons were employed at Schenectady General Electric. Today the employment figure is closer to 20,000. Alco Products Co., formerly the American Locomotive Co., employed some 10,000 people back in 1951; today their employment is in the neighborhood of 2,000. The unemployment situation in Schenectady has stemmed largely from these changes.

As far as General Electric is concerned, I believe Schenectady has been part of an economic trend that is not perhaps unique in our city, namely, the gradual shift of industry from established industrial areas of the Northeast into the South and the West. The company first announced plans for this shift back in 1953. They have been going on gradually since then, although the recession of 1957 and 1958 made the situation even more acute than the company had anticipated.

The situation with regard to Alco is somewhat different. It stems largely from a decline in the railroad industry generally, plus some readjustment in production activities of the company outside of Schenectady, though in this case not outside of New York State. Local real estate taxes, by the way, have added to Alco's difficulties—a situation that is not uncommon in other communities hit by unemployment and declining populations.

I believe the committee may want to explore somewhat further the reasons for these shifts. No doubt there is a general desire today on the part of many companies to decentralize operations, with not so much volume of production in a larger number of cities, rather than a higher volume in a few cities in which the company is the overwhelming sole employer. Perhaps there is also a desire to move out of established areas into areas where labor is less well organized, where living standards are lower, and where social legislation and the benefits provided by State law are not as progressive as they have become in New York State. In any event, the result of this shift has been to place the emphasis in Schenectady today almost entirely on heavy industry, that is, the production of turbines and turbine generators. Lighter industry, the consumer products, have almost all moved out of Schenectady. And since heavy industry notoriously lags behind the general economic trend, Schenectady is today witnessing the strange phenomenon of people being thrown off the job even as new orders for turbine manufacturing are coming in. But it takes more than a year to plan a turbine, and the production workers are laid off the job while the preliminary planning is under way.

In Amsterdam in the carpet industry, and in the glove industry of Fulton County, the situation is one that has gone on for a longer period of time. Representatives from these areas will give you more details and fuller figures; but the blunt and simple fact of the matter is that in promoting the industrial growth of other countries such as Germany, Italy, Japan, and the Philippines, we have also succeeded at the same time in undermining the jobs of people in Amsterdam, Gloversville, and Johnstown. This trend has been going on, as I say, for many years, but it has become especially severe in the past few years and as a result both of these areas are now listed as chronic unemployment areas, in fact they are the only two chronic unemployment areas in New York State. Certainly we cannot sacrifice our own people in helping those in foreign countries.

One other feature has been added to the problem, and that is the decision on the part of the Federal Government last year to close down the U.S. Naval Supply Depot at Scotia. This decision was unfortunately taken without regard for the already depressed economy of the area, and involved the loss of some additional 675 jobs.

Now what are my recommendations to the committee for legislation to deal with this problem?

(1) I believe there is a need for legislation to assist communities like Schenectady, Amsterdam, Gloversville, and Johnstown which are already seeking to help themselves in bringing in new industry to fill in the job gap. The so-called distressed areas bill, of which I am proud, incidentally, to be a cosponsor, is legislation which would be extremely helpful in this direction. Amsterdam has had substantial success in organizing a community undertaking of its own to attract new industry; similar community endeavors are under way in Schenectady and in Fulton Counties. Yet it is not always possible for communities which are economically hard hit to find all of the ready funds that might be needed to purchase industrial parks, erect industrial buildings, or do other things to bring in new industry. Likewise there is no fund readily available to help in the retraining of personnel from one type of business to another, something that is often needed before a new industry can be helpful. This the distressed areas bill would do.

(2) The committee should recommend adoption of a bill which I introduced in the last session of Congress, H.R. 5559, to provide a measure of Federal tax relief for businesses which move into an unemployment area or which expand in such an area. With such legislation on the books areas like our own would be in a better position to compete with some of the concessions now being given by areas in States which do not have the same progressive level of legislation we have in New York. Such a bill would help us keep the industry we already have, which is just as important as bringing in new industry.

(3) Some legislation, similar to bills I have introduced, to cut down on foreign imports of gloves, and to give the U.S. Tariff Commission greater power in adjusting tariffs and quotas—as in the carpet and glove industries—to help local industries being driven to the wall by foreign competition.

(4) Some insistence on the part of the Federal Government that reductions in military bases be made only following a careful study of the impact of such closings on the local economy, and be adjusted to such local conditions. In fact I have already recommended that the House Armed Services Committee undertake such an inquiry, so as to avoid in the future just the sort of thing that has happened here at Scotia. As a result of concerted action by all members of the New York State congressional delegation, additional defense contracts have been coming into New York State. But unfortunately not many of them have come in here because, as I have mentioned, most of the defense production has been moved out of Schenectady. Developmental contracts employ engineers and scientists, but they do not employ production workers.

I don't need to reiterate in detail to the committee the social impact of unemployment. Younger people are being forced to leave our cities and go elsewhere in search of work. This means that the money we have already invested in their education will not come back to us in terms of their contribution to local community life and achievement. Retired persons are also forced to leave the community because of the absence of some other breadwinner in the family to help them meet expenses after retirement. Increased real estate taxes which inevitably result from the destruction of established industrial properties also promote the flight of individuals out of our area and complicate the problem of attracting new businesses in. The social impact of families supported by a working mother with the father out of a job. And no family wants to go through the agonizing decision of whether to take the children out of school and sell the family homestead and move into some other area on the outside chance that jobs may be more plentiful somewhere else, rather than sticking it out here until things pick up.

One final word with regard to some of the statistics in connection with our area. According to the press Schenectady has recently been removed from the area of substantial labor surplus and has been classified as an area of only moderate labor surplus. Actually in these determinations Schenectady is always included with Albany and Troy. It is hard for me to see how these figures have been arrived at because unemployment has certainly not been arrested in Schenectady. In fact I am informed the situation here will get worse before it gets better with further layoffs expected in the turbine industry in the very near future.

Perhaps better prospects in Albany have brought up the overall total of the Tri-City area, but it would be most unfortunate if for this reason Schenectady were therefore legaly barred from receiving any help under the distressed areas bill. Actually much of the unemployment in the chronic areas of Amsterdam and Gloversville is directly tied into the Schenectady situation. Many of the husbands of women who work in the glove industry in Fulton County or the carpet industry in Amsterdam have been employed in the turbine plant in Schenectady, so that assistance provided to the Schenectady area could well have a substantial effect in improving the economy of Amsterdam and Fulton County. I hope the committee will recommend changes in this legislation which would make such assistance possible in spite of such statistical anomalies as those I have mentioned.

Let me close by saying that I believe firmly that the problem we are faced with here is not merely a local problem. It is a problem of clearcut national concern. A cancer growing in any one portion of the body can ultimately be fatal to the body as a whole. A disease raging in one area of a city can eventually spread to other areas. Similarly I believe that unless we move swiftly to check the cancer of unemployment and underemployment in established industrial areas like our own in the great Northeast, the prospect of other areas will likewise be seriously impaired. For all these reasons I believe the Congress and the Government of the United States have a responsibility and a duty to act to arrest this economic cancer.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, for several years now many Members of Congress, myself among them, have introduced legislation designed to alleviate chronic unemployment and underemployment in the many economically depressed areas of this country. This legislation is of paramount importance if we are to keep faith in the true American fashion with all of our citizens—fortunate and unfortunate alike. For today, even though we have emerged strongly from the recent recession, there are many areas in this Nation where vast numbers of people are out of work. This is true of both urban and rural areas. These areas and the people in them need assistance. These people are hungry. The areas are in a depressed economic condition. The answer lies in these areas being able to acquire or rehabilitate industrial facilities for new businesses. If the financial assistance to accomplish this end is not furnished to these sections, we will simply be perpetuating mass unemployment, which is already the Nation's biggest problem. We will also be in the dangerous position of creating throughout the country pockets of chronic unemployment and economic depression.

I am sure that all this is obvious to everyone here today. And yet the legislation aimed at alleviating this situation has not been permitted to reach the floor for debate and a vote. You may recall the one bill of this type which successfully passed both Houses was vetoed by the President in the summer of 1958. Since that unfortunate occasion, the persistent unemployment has continued in certain sections of the Nation. The need for this type of assistance has been even more clearly apparent during the past year. I exhort every Member of Congress to give careful consideration to this problem. Those Members who have this situation prevalent in their own States and districts are well aware of the crying need for remedial action. Those more fortunate Members who do not face this problem at firsthand may well have to do so one day. Whatever the situation may be back home, every Member should certainly be allowed to hear debate on this matter and have the opportunity to vote as his conscience dictates. Yet this opportunity apparently is not forthcoming.

I am from Detroit—one of the great industrial centers of this Nation—and I have seen this problem at first hand for longer than I care to recall. At the time of the Presidential veto of the depressed area bill in 1958, the unemployment in Detroit had reached 18 percent of the work force. Eighteen percent. Sounds unbelievable, does it not? But true. All too true, sadly enough. I myself have introduced legislation of this bent for several Congresses now. The unemployment is still there. And yet I find myself unable to cast my vote in the interests of the people I know to be in serious need of assistance. This is not right. The current bill was passed by the Senate in March of last year and was favorably reported by the House Banking and Currency Committee in May of last year. It has not yet been permitted to come before the full membership for a vote. This is wrong and unjustifiable.

The concept of furnishing the necessary aid to these depressed areas is not simply high-flown altruism. A quarter century ago we accepted as national policy the premise that unemployment is not a local problem but a national one. This was the philosophy underlying the Social Security Act. The assistance provided is realistic and practical, as written in the current bill. It takes the form of long-term, low-interest loans to the hard-hit communities for launching new industries. It also provides for technical assistance, vocational retraining, and funds needed for public facilities to accommodate the new industries. These facets fit together into a sort of package plan that relieves the communities of several burdens. This assistance will buttress the local economic base by bringing new industries and businesses. It will reduce the local unemployment problem by supplying many new jobs in the new plants. But the relief does not end here. There are many other ways in which this assistance will help the localities. It will greatly diminish many of the heavy traffic problems that plague cities today by providing industrial sites with ample parking space for all employees and by establishing these sites within the very localities where the workers reside. This will eliminate the necessity for the now prevalent long drives to and from places of employment. Furthermore, by placing these new industrial plants in places where such public facilities as traffic lights, sewer and water lines, sufficient power supply and other utility necessities already exist, a tremendous burden is lifted from the already harassed area governments. These are considerations about aid to depressed areas which are all too often overlooked. They are certainly of great import to the sections in need of aid and should be kept clearly in mind.

All of this represents assistance that is desperately needed in many areas of the United States. To deny such assistance would indeed be shameful. But to deny to the Members of this body even the chance to decide this matter is unfair and unforgivable. In conclusion, therefore, I should like to urge strongly that every Member of this House do everything he can to get this legislation onto the floor.

Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, I arise to add my voice to that of my colleague from New York, and to associate myself with him in his efforts to obtain immediate action on S. 722, the area redevelopment bill. This bill has been in the control of the House Rules Committee since last May.

The time has come to speak frankly. Last September 14, the day before adjournment, I called attention to this very situation. I said then, that failure to deal with the problem of the distressed areas was the only large blot on the record of this Congress. I said also that consideration of S. 722 should be the first order of business at this session. I repeat both statements.

The conditions existing in certain parts of the country, which create a need for this legislation, have been discussed in more than 200 speeches before this House since last January. These conditions have since been investigated and verified by the field hearings of the Special Senate Committee on Unemployment Problems, which toured the country during the recess.

The long-term chronic unemployment problem which we had in September remains with us today. The glowing predictions of prosperity to come, and the settlement of the steel strike have not affected and will not touch the hard core of our unemployed who have been jobless for 26 weeks or more. Each succeeding monthly tabulation of statistics reveals the same percentage of long-term chronic unemployment.

Our millions who have exhausted unemployment compensation benefits, and drag out a bare existence with the help of surplus agricultural commodities, are still with us. There is no significant decline in their numbers.

Anyone who read the press reports of the President's reply to an inquiry by Senator COOPER, regarding administration plans for the distressed areas can only conclude that from past performances we cannot expect help from the White House. Indeed, on the basis of attitudes expressed recently it is doubtful that we can even expect comprehension of the problem at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue.

If the regular course of legislative activity, bearing on a grievous national problem, is to be stymied by ordinary human whims, unsupported by constitutional authority, perhaps a flair for drama will support the cause. Perhaps a caravan of ragged children from depressed mining districts should be paraded before the doors of the committee room. Perhaps our spokesmen for food-for-peace programs should be required to travel through depressed portions of the United States as a preface to any consideration of the needs of the Asiatic and African peoples.

There is no hope for assistance for these unemployed and their families outside this Chamber. If we do not act, no one else will. The language of S. 722 does not make the bill a cure-all, but it offers a first step in an inevitable program to place the power and prestige of this Government behind corrective action for the benefit of its most sorely tried citizens.

We have the right to listen and debate. I say that, in this instance, any of us who lay claims to Christian convictions and conduct must rise up to demand that right.

Mr. STRATTON. I would like to thank the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SLACK] for his statement. I may say I agree with him that we have to continue the fight he has suggested in order to make sure that this bill comes out of committee in spite of the reassuring words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I may say in connection with the gentleman's reference to the President of the United States that the press references that I saw were a little ambiguous and there is some doubt as to whether the President is behind this bill or not. I took the report in its best light, but it may well be that the gentleman's interpretation is closer to the facts. However, in any event, I am sure there will have to be ample adjustment before we can count on getting the bill approved at the other end of the avenue.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the very able gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HECHLER. I wish to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] for opening up this issue.

With reference to the remarks the gentleman just made about the President, I would think that all of us should join in an invitation to President Eisenhower to visit some of the distressed areas of the country in order to get a first-hand picture of what these conditions are. His visit abroad was a very dramatic thing and it did a great deal of good in inspiring the people abroad. But I think also we should look homeward. I would like to issue an invitation to President Eisenhower to visit West Virginia, and I am sure the Representatives of other States would like to have him come and see conditions in their States so that some action may be taken on this long overdue area redevelopment bill.

In West Virginia conditions have not improved very much. In some sections the situation is worse than in the darkest days of the depression of the 1930's.

Recently the Unemployment Subcommittee held hearings in Welch, Beckley, Fayetteville, and Wheeling. The hearings were chaired by my able and hard-working colleague from the other body, Senator JENNINGS RANDOLPH. I testified before that committee, as did Mr. MOORE, my colleague, who I understand made a special trip back from Denver to testify, because of the urgency of the situation. My other colleagues, Messrs. SLACK, BAILEY, and STAGGERS, and Mrs. KEE also testified. Many people have exhausted their unemployment benefits. The younger people are leaving the State in great numbers.

We need action, Mr. Speaker. The bill is confined to that great gas chamber which is the Committee on Rules. Why do we stand by and wait while the gas chamber, like the crematories of Buchenwald silently dispose of the bill in the nether regions of the Capitol, while we, its friends and relatives, weep over the starving people of our States. We need action on this bill.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for his helpful remarks. He has certainly painted the picture in dramatic terms.

I now yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman from New York for the manner in which he has developed the story concerning the depressed areas legislation.

I join him in another regard, Mr. Speaker, that is, the attitude that he has developed since coming here to the Congress concerning the tariff laws and policies of this country of ours. For a long time past I have been a strong advocate of a change in the tariff policies of the country. I am hopeful that his constituents who are going to the Tariff Commission next week to lay before that Commission the facts that their industry is being seriously depressed as a result of importation of foreign goods, that they will receive a unanimous report from the Commission favorable to their industry. Further that it will be the decision of the State Department and the President to accept that decision graciously. This has not been the case, Mr. Speaker, in so many of the instances which have been presented on behalf of American industry in the past before the Tariff Commission.

With respect to the depressed area legislation, I have previously introduced a bill which is the administration bill in this regard; and I had hoped for serious consideration of that legislation by the Banking and Currency Committee. That committee, however, has seen fit to report to the Rules Committee S. 722. Whether that legislation in itself is going to be the answer to all of our problems, that is those of us who have a serious depressed area problem, I cannot say. I can say, however, that the part of West Virginia I have the privilege to represent is not touched by this legislation now pending. Seventeen counties in our State would receive benefits under this legislation now pending before the Rules Committee. However, as a West Virginian, as a Representative from a State that has a severe problem in the field of depressed areas and in the field of unemployment I feel it is my duty as a Representative here in the Congress to add my voice to that of my fellow West Virginians, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from New York, to do all that I possibly can to bring to the floor of this House S. 722 in order that the House may work its will.

I certainly want to compliment the gentleman for taking the time here this afternoon to spell out the need for the legislation which has been so dramatically over the years brought to the attention of the House, but apparently not with such force or vigor as to convince those who occupy positions on the Rules Committee that we ought to have a chance to work our will.

So I want to join the gentleman from New York and my colleagues from West Virginia in bringing to the attention of the House this afternoon the condition that exists and the status of the depressed areas legislation.

Mr. STRATTON. I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from West Virginia for his very generous remarks. His comments bear out what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said a moment ago. We have a genuine problem to solve. This is not a matter of party, it is a matter of recognizing a problem that cuts across party lines, and I sincerely hope we will be able to meet it with suitable legislation.

I would agree with the gentleman that no one bill is probably going to provide the complete answer to this problem. There will have to be other pieces of legislation.

With respect to the Tariff Commission, as the gentleman well knows, you go to the Tariff Commission and even if you are fortunate enough to get a favorable decision, there is still a possibility of a veto by the State Department for international reasons. I have joined with other Members of this body, and I think the gentleman from West Virginia has too, in introducing legislation that would remove that power so that when you cross the first hurdle and get a recognition by those who are particularly qualified to judge on this matter of whether or not domestic industry is being hurt, their findings based on the realities of the situation cannot then be vitiated by someone else who is not so familiar with the economic problem.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. It certainly seems silly to me to appoint six individuals to the Tariff Commission and pay each of them $20,000 per year for the specific purpose of sitting and listening to evidence presented by American industry on unfair competition they are encountering in the tariff field from foreign goods, have these members of the Commission adopt a report unanimously finding that the American industry is entitled to some relief, and then have the executive branch of the Government utterly disregard in so many instances that unanimous finding of the Commission. It just does not make sense to me.

Mr. STRATTON. I agree emphatically with the gentleman and I thank him for his statement.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH AND SAFETY ARE INVOLVED IN STRIKE SETTLEMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is evident there must be an end to strikes that not only tie up production in a basic industry like steel, but shut down other factories which cannot operate while a strike continues.

If one group after another, as is now threatened, can create a situation as did the steelworkers—see the President's statement and the Supreme Court's decision—United Steelworkers of America v. United States of America (No. 504, November 7, 1959)—when they threatened to imperil the national health and safety, Congress cannot escape its duty to write and enforce legislation which will destroy the power of any group to compel others to pay the wage, grant the benefits demanded. The steelworkers' demands were, in the main, met.

Such a power, an example of which we have just witnessed in connection with the steel strike, is no less than tyranny. Means, if continued, the end of our freedom—of our form of government.

Most humble, most respectful, and most earnest, is my suggestion that Mr. NIXON, who is my ideal of what an American—a President—should be, and the able, equally patriotic Senator KENNEDY, give prayerful consideration to the situation, suggest means to lighten the burden which now rests upon the Congress.

GAMBLING IN NEW YORK CITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include certain extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in this hallowed spot to present to the American people the continued and shocking disregard of law and order in my city, unfortunately, and in my district in particular.

I include as a preface to my remarks an article which appeared in the New York Times of January 10, 1960, written by Emanuel Perlmutter:

NEW YORK NUMBERS RACKET IS BIG BUSINESS—CRACKDOWN FOLLOWS POWELL CHARGE OF BIAS AGAINST NEGRO OPERATORS

(By Emanuel Perlmutter)

Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., stirred up his Harlem district last week by charging that white racketeers have driven Negroes from control of policy, or numbers, gambling in that area. He accused the police of permitting the white syndicate forces to operate while arresting Negroes.

Police Commissioner Stephen B. Kennedy denied the charge and his men followed up by staging large-scale roundups in which they arrested more than 150 persons in Harlem, mainly low-echelon policy employees. The race of those arrested was not disclosed.

The charge made by Representative POWELL that more Negroes than white men have been arrested in Harlem is true. But this is explained by the police as follows:

Eighty-two percent of those arrested on numbers gambling charges in Harlem last year were Negroes. This approximates the Negro percentage of Harlem's population.

However, it is also true that the Negro bankers who once controlled numbers gambling there have either been driven out by the white racketeers or are now working for them.

The policy game is the simplest and most popular form of gambling in New York City. It is the most difficult for the police to control, as well as the one offering the most opportunity for police graft.

ONE-HUNDRED MILLION A YEAR

Betting on the numbers is a poor man's hobby. Wagers are for small amounts—many for as low as a nickel or a dime, although occasionally an affluent player may invest $100 on a number. In the most common form of policy gambling in this city, the player places his bet on any combination of three numbers. He wins if the three numbers he has chosen correspond to three numbers appearing in the same order in a previously designated portion of the day's parimutuel betting total at a selected racetrack.

The police and New York prosecutors estimate that about 1,500,000 persons in the metropolitan area play the numbers each day and that they wager about $10 million a year.

The usual payoff is at 600 to 1 odds. However, the player usually gets only 500 to 1, the remaining 100 being kept as commission by the man who took his bet. In addition, the policy operators lower the odds further on the most popular numbers. Players also can make their wagers in candy stores, bars, restaurants, and other retail establishments known as drops.

Bets made with runners and at drops are picked up by an employe called a collector. He brings the slips with their bets to a controller, who can be likened to the branch manager of a bank. The controller in turn delivers the slips to the "bank," which is headquarters of the betting ring.

The banker may be a powerful individual operating on his own or the representative of a syndicate. Today most numbers banks in New York are controlled by an Italian syndicate. An average bank does about $15,000 a week business. The large ones average $100,000. Bank locations are changed regularly to avoid police detection.

The runners and drop employees receive a percentage—usually 15 to 20 percent—of the money bet with them. (They also get a cut of any lucky client's payoff.) They are paid by the controller, out of his 35 percent of the take. The remaining 65 percent goes to the banker, who puts up the capital for the operation and takes care of the graft payments. In addition to the field men, the policy-ring personnel includes clerks and bookkeepers who work in the bank tallying the bets and payoffs. There are also security members of the ring whose main job is to circulate in the vicinity of controllers' branches and the banks on the lookout for the police.

PLAINCLOTHES FORCE

Gambling and vice investigations in New York City are handled solely by plainclothes policemen. There are 457 of the department's 23,897 policemen assigned to this work. Because of the graft temptations to which the plainclothes men are exposed, they are subjected to periodic shakeups. Such a wholesale housecleaning took place in 1958, when the entire Harlem plainclothes division was transferred as a result of bribery disclosures.

Despite the strict disciplinary regulations imposed by Police Commissioner Kennedy, policy gambling continues to increase. This is indicated by arrest figures. There were 9,459 policy arrests in 1956; 11,206 in 1957, and 13,252 in 1958. For the first 11 months of 1959, the total was 12,870. A projection indicates that last year's gambling arrests were higher than those in 1958 or any other previous year. These figures are construed by most observers as reflecting increases in gambling rather than improved police work.

I must commend the Journal-American for their series which is continuing, edited by three outstanding reporters, one of whom, Dom Frasca, wrote a most authoritative book on the maffia.

Several months ago a former police sergeant by the name of Luberda was arrested for drunken driving in a nearby county to New York City. In his car was not only discovered $19,495 in cash but also a series of sheets listing the names of the major number bankers and their addresses and the amount of money they were paying off each week. These sheets have never been made public. I hold in my hand photostatic copies of them.

The Journal-American printed these sheets last week, but when they received the sheets the addresses of these various racketeers were erased. I would now like to read these addresses and names and the amount of the payoff into the RECORD.

Louis the Gimp, who operates in front of my church, has five drops in Harlem and allegedly paid off $750 a week. We have another sheet where the payoff is only $100 a week to people lower down the scale.

The addresses are 539 Lenox Avenue; 466 Lenox Avenue; butch, 677 Lenox Avenue; candy, 582 Lexington Avenue; Carter at 133d Street and 5th Avenue; and Richys, 146th and 8th Avenue.

I would like to read the rest of the names of the number bankers and their addresses:

Candy, 258 West 148th Street.
Candy, 310 West 145th Street.
Uncle Bill, 312 West 145th Street.
Greystone Restaurant, Eighth Avenue.
Danny's, 134 Street and Eighth Avenue.
Raython, 169 West 133d Street.
Marshall, 2200 Seventh Avenue.

Sid, 140th Street and Lenox Avenue.

Benedetto, 134th Street, Seventh and Lenox Avenue.

T & C, 139th Street and Seventh Avenue.

Henry's, 148 Eighth Avenue.

Leo-Sunshine Grocery, Eighth Avenue.

Lou, 95th Street and Second Avenue.

Mattie, 135th Street and Eighth Avenue.

Rose's, 140th and 8th Avenue.

Popp Tailor, 139th and Lenox.

Here is an operation which I do not think is connected with the Maffia:

Gibel, 308 137th Street, 459 Lenox, 117th and 133d.

Then comes barber, 326 135th Street or 145th Street.

Roxy's grocery store, Eighth Avenue.

Scottie, 143d and 8th Avenue.

Sully, 171 West 135th, candy.

Oliver's, 147th and 8th Avenue.

Karl, 144th and 8th Avenue.

Red, 25 138th Street.

Charley White, 142d Street and 8th Avenue.

Stick's, 154th Street and 8th Avenue.

Now, from the other payoff sheet these are additional names:

Joe Pellegrino, phone number at that time, TR 6–9280. He operates, not in my district, 108th Street and Park Avenue.

Then come the Black Bros., 118th Street and Lenox Avenue.

Bill Sherrit, 115th and Lenox.

Bryal Carnion, 113th and 8th Avenue.

Moe and Nack, 125th Street and Madison.

Then come three first names: Lou, 95th and 2d Avenue; Tom, 102 2d Avenue; Danny, 134th and 8th Avenue.

Lou Gimp, reprinted again, no need in repeating his name.

Then comes Artie, 145th and Broadway.

Then comes Wiz, 142d and 8th Avenue.

Jack Berger, 2020 Seventh Avenue.

Manny, 126th Street and—it looks like Madison Avenue.

Robbie, 150th and 8th Avenue.

Bobby Lloyd, 111 East 125th Street.

I have just received an anonymous phone call which gives me another operation in upper Harlem, not in my district. The bankers in charge of this operation are Nick Angelo and Louie B. They hang out in the Riverview Restaurant and Bar at 3543 Broadway.

Then comes another banker, Tony D'Amato, 509, 522, and 526 West 147th Street.

Tony Plait at 529 and 531 West 151st Street. These names have been phoned in to me.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD a sermon delivered by me this past Sunday at both of the services of our church, as reported by the press, to 6,000 people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SERMON BY ADAM C. POWELL, JANUARY 10, 1960, 10 AND 12 NOON

Since I spoke out against the numbers 1 week ago today, the community of Harlem has saved at least $1 million. The numbers have only operated one day since then because on Tuesday morning the police of this city closed down every place arresting over 100 of the petty members of the number racket. The estimated amount of money that is played in my district each week is around $1 million.

One of the unanswered questions that I would like to pose today is how is it possible for the police department to say that they do not know the places, and they do not know the number operators yet, on a 36-hour warning from this pulpit, were able to close down every place in this area and arrest over 100 people? I said to the press on Tuesday morning, January 5, in the presence of the deputy chief inspector and his staff that the police department knows every single name that I have and every single place that I would produce, but they have not been apprehended nor closed down.

Now there has been a lot of conjecturing as to why I did what I did. I have held conferences through the years with various police commissioners, including the present one. I have pointed out the invasion of Harlem by white musclemen, resulting in beatings and even sometimes the killing of Negroes who stood in their way. The unchallenged fact which the deputy chief did not answer on Tuesday in front of the press: there is not operating anywhere in Harlem, a single Negro banker. The entire operation is totally in the hands of people who do not reside in nor are connected with my community.

I have been advised by some people that there is a resentment in some quarters, even in the Negro community, that I have deprived them of their habit of playing the numbers and have deprived the petty number runners of their illegal livelihood. Mention has been made that this might even cause political repercussions. Now I would like to state unequivocally that this has only served to strengthen my resolve and purpose. I am determined more than ever before to pursue what I started out with, not only in this area, but in the lower East Harlem Puerto Rico area, in Brooklyn, Bronx, and wherever I can get the cooperation of the people.

For me to withdraw because of possible political repercussions would be a confession of moral weakness on my part; and, also, for me to withdraw would mean that this community is so morally decadent and degenerate that it would be hopeless for me to pursue this matter. I have stood in this community for 30 years as a leader. I need nothing more and if what I am going to do is going to hurt me personally, I welcome the consequences.

I am not afraid of the Maffia, the syndicate, the gangsters and hoodlums. I have specifically asked the police department not to provide me with any bodyguards.

I would like to emphatically state once and for all, including my assistant ministers, that no one at any time, in any way represents me. I understand that there have been efforts made by the underworld to reach me through some of my self-called associates. I have no associates in this endeavor. If other individuals want to help, it is up to them. But nothing that anyone does can in any way, directly or indirectly, be attributable to me. And, furthermore, if any individual in any way claims they represent me and are trying to intercede in this issue I will be the first one to agree with the press that they are liars as far as I am concerned.

The police department of this town needs a citizen who can speak from this pulpit and the pulpit of Congress; who is not afraid and who can lay before the American public this continued and shocking flaunting of law and order.

I am not charging anyone with anything, but I am stating one unchallengeable fact, that the Maffia and the syndicate are in complete control of Harlem and that Negroes are the ones who are arrested while the whites go free. May I point out here that Deputy Police Commissioner Arm should apologize to me and to this community or be removed immediately by the commissioner for his out-and-out lie in the newspapers of last Wednesday, for he said, and I quote from the daily papers. He was asked by the press: "What was the percentage of whites and Negroes arrested in the Tuesday raids?" He said, "I am not playing POWELL'S game, we do not issue any statistics based upon race." Yet, just a few paragraphs later in the same news story, Deputy Chief Burns said "Eighty-two percent of those arrested were Negro." This indicates clearly that the deputy police commissioner was lying. I would also like the press of this city to investigate the lawyers' names that appear on misdemeanor slips in the magistrates' and special sessions courts of those who are arrested for numbers. Find out through the proper authorities who pays them for representing the numbers runners arraigned in the local courts. I am sure that they will find out that a high official within the New York City government is involved in this as a lawyer.

I come today at this hour of spiritual emphasis to stress the moral implications of the policy racket in this community and for that matter in any other community.

SECTION I

If this low-income community has drained from it between $3 million and $4 million a month, then the first fact I wish to point out is that the numbers is pauperizing Harlem.

SECTION II

Deputy Chief Inspector Burns has said that roughly 4,500 people were arrested last year for numbers in the 10th division, Harlem. The Library of Congress is researching this for me. That means, over the past 12 years, there have been 50,000 arrests in this community, and I would double that figure for five boroughs. In other words, 100,000 Negroes have been arrested during the past 12 years. This means that this community is being criminalized. Once a person is arrested it is almost impossible to receive private employment any more. There have been many, many tragic incidents of those who had civil service jobs who were forced to resign because at some time they had been arrested for the misdemeanor of being connected with the numbers.

SECTION III. WHAT SHALL WE DO?

In the first place, I warn the police department and alert the citizens that there shall not be a reign of terror in this community. It is possible that some members of the police department who may have been on the payroll of the policy barons out of sheer desperation and anger will resort to brutality, illegal entry of homes, and unlawful arrests. I strongly condemn the police department now for their failure to arrest whites this past Tuesday, January 5, for their failure to carry out similar numbers raids in lower East Harlem, and the Bronx, and Brooklyn; they knew the places and the individuals. I strongly condemn Police Commissioner Kennedy now for his failure to have at the top in police headquarters, a Negro and remind him that I not only asked that if one of the police commissioner deputyships could not be a Negro that a Negro be named secretary of the police department. This he has refused to do and the position is still vacant. The mayor should intercede now and demand that qualified Negroes be appointed at command levels.

In the second place, I call on the mayor of the city of New York to appoint a special commission with supena power to investigate the numbers and everything with it and I offer myself, even though I have more than I can do now, to serve on this commission.

Third, I have this day sent a wire to the Governor of New York State asking him to institute a special investigation of numbers in this city through State law enforcement agencies, through a special commission, through the State attorney general or through all three.

Fourth, I ask the Governor in this wire to call for legislation giving him the power not just to pardon people because of felonies, which is now the law, but to be able to pardon people who have been convicted of misdemeanors. I ask our local representatives in Albany to introduce the appropriate legislation immediately.

SECTION IV. WHAT CAN WE DO AS INDIVIDUALS?

In the first place there is a need for a moral reawakening in this community. The playing of numbers is not due to any inherent racial weakness, it is due to the fact that far too many do not receive wages sufficient for their needs and feel that through the easy way they can hit the numbers and provide that margin now. This of course is factually impossible. A sucker never wins, only the combine, syndicate, and maffia. All this points up the need for moral reawakening. It may take a little time but just think that every day we keep the heat on the police department and keep the heat on the bums that infected this community. Every week we do this we are saving a million dollars. Just think what $50 million in 1 year could do for Harlem. Think of the banks, housing, churches, private hospitals.

In the second place, we need to realize that we as a community are sick. Just as narcotics becomes habit forming for the individual, so has the numbers become habit forming for about 50,000 people in this area. We need to "kick the habit."

Instead of the old symbols of "get rich quick," "do it the easy way," we need the new symbol of "stand together." Take these pennies, nickels, dollars that we have been squandering, deposit them in our banks, pool our resources and let's lift ourselves up.

All of the heritage of the Negro people is now being aborted, squandered and dissipated. Here we find our community lower in income than nearly any other community in New York and yet each year we are sending out $50 million of our money to support another community.

Here we are face to face with a new birth of equality in our educational system. Next month hundreds of Negro children are moving out of Harlem going to a new school in Yorkville. All the forces of society are now moving toward a better day for Negro people with better education. How can we be worthy of this new day? How can our children be respected and respectable as long as they come from these homes that have been pauperized and criminalized by the sickness of their parents?

And finally, I call for an individual catharsis. We as individuals need to take a mighty force into our own beings to purge us of the weaknesses and the accumulated sicknesses and to individually say that by the grace of God, I am going to stand firm. I will not go back. I will take my place as a member of society. I refuse to allow myself to be pauperized and criminalized by the sickness of gambling and the sinister forces of the Maffia. I plead with the Department of Justice, the Governor, the mayor, the five district attorneys to go to work and clean up this festering cancer forced on us by the outside elements.

Mr. POWELL. In this sermon I gave to the law enforcement agencies of New York two leads on how to discover the maffia and track them down. All the arrests are of the petty numbers runners and collectors, nearly all Negroes and Puerto Ricans. Not a single banker has been arrested in New York City at all. They go free. They can track them down as follows:

The 13,000 who went before the gamblers courts—both the magistrates and special sessions—last year are represented all the time by virtually the same lawyers. Speaking only of the Borough of Manhattan 90 percent of the 4,500 who were tried last year were represented by the same lawyers; one lawyer uptown and two or three downtown. One of these lawyers is a New York City official and his name, as all the other names of the lawyers, appears in the records of the courts. When a defendant comes before the court he must state the name and address of his counsel who is present.

These numbers people arrested do not pay their lawyers. The lawyers work for the combines, the syndicate and the Maffia, and have a flat charge of $25 a head. They are not paid by the person who is arrested.

So the first thing I am requesting is that the proper authorities—county, city, State, or Federal—shall find out from these lawyers whose names are a matter of record, who pays them.

The second lead I would like to give is this: The bail bond business for these arrested people is almost totally in the hands of one individual. They do not pay for their bail bond. A $500 bond, under standard practice, costs $25 to obtain. This is paid for them by the maffia or the syndicate or combine, whichever group they are working for. Therefore, if the authorities are really interested in this, they can put under oath this bail bondsman and find out who pays him.

I would like to say that everything I am saying was backed up last Monday by the meetings of the Interdenominational Ministers Conference of New York and the Baptist Ministers Conference of New York before whom I appeared. They are backing me unanimously, and represent some 514 churches in our town.

Why have I brought this before this body? Because of the fact that this situation has been in existence in my community and in New York for years and continues to get worse. At a press conference held last Tuesday, the deputy chief inspector, Mr. Burns, in charge of my area, and his staff were present. In front of the New York press I challenged him. I said, "Every name and every address that I have, you know." He knows them. The police department knows them. And the proof of it is that when I delivered this warning from the pulpit at 5 o'clock on Sunday, January 3, within 36 hours the police had closed down many numbers places in my congressional district and had arrested 105 people. So they knew the names and the places. But they only did it in my congressional district, not touching any in any other district. That is why I am bringing in the other names and places in the districts nearby.

I am appealing from this pulpit here for some agency to really get to work on this problem that is pauperizing and criminalizing the poor of New York.

I have complete confidence in the mayor of our town, Mr. Wagner, as an individual. I have complete confidence in the police commissioner of our town, Mr. Kennedy, as an individual. I have confidence in the five district attorneys as individuals, one of whom is our former colleague, Representative Dollinger, now the district attorney of the Bronx. But I do not have confidence in everyone underneath them. The events of the years showing that this operation can go on and showing that, according to the authoritative book on the maffia, the numbers in New York is the backbone of the Maffia in this country, the fact that it can continue and these people go unarrested and these places go unchallenged, means that someone somewhere down the line in a responsible position must be taking big payoffs. Judge Mullen said this in sentencing Sergeant Luberda.

I would also like to take this opportunity, and will follow it up with suitable correspondence today, to ask the Department of Justice to investigate every name I have presented today and to see whether the gambling stamp tax has been paid. The gambling stamp tax legislation was passed by this body and signed October 20, 1951 and became law November 1, 1951. I would like each name checked for each year since, to see if they have paid their gambling stamp tax. If they have not, then the Federal Government has an opportunity to move into this problem.

This is just the beginning of many such talks I will make, one a week, revealing more names as they come to me, hoping that some agency of our Government, local, State, or Federal will stop letting its hands be tied by these vicious gangsters, operating not only in my town but operating in nearly every major city in this country. Maybe what I say here each week revealing the names and addresses will put enough heat under the proper city, county, State, and Federal authority, and put enough heat under the lawless element itself, so that if we cannot drive out gambling we can subdue it so it will not be as flagrant as it is now.

Naturally, I have received many threats over the phone and through the mails, but these do not interest me one bit. I will be here, with God's help, next week to put more names and more addresses into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE LATE GOVERNOR CLINTON A. CLAUSON, OF MAINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, today my two colleagues from Maine, Mr. OLIVER and Mr. MCINTIRE, and I wish to share a loss which our State has suffered with this House. In so doing, we intend more than a formality. We speak out of deep sorrow, but also out of a sense of pride.

On December 30, 1959, our Governor, Clinton A. Clauson, died. His death was wholly unexpected and has been deeply mourned by the entire State. The impressive ceremonies attending the decease of a head of State are now history; the eulogies have been delivered; the appreciative editorials have been written; the wheels of government roll on; and the family and friends are left alone with their emptiness, which only memories and time can banish.

It remains for us in both Chambers, Maine's official family in Washington, to add our words of sorrow and of affection. I said we speak today from a sense of pride. In this combative era, where politics and government are often characterized by high octane individuals and elaborate apparatus for public relations, our friend, Clinton A. Clauson, stood out in refreshing contrast. He allowed himself to be himself. He required no apparatus other than his own hands, his feet, and his ready smile. No one liked people more, or was more liked by people.

His secret weapon, which enabled him to win the governorship against heavy odds, and which helped him write an excellent record of service during his year in office, was friendliness. It was not the type of friendliness which was dispensed only to friends or to those who conceivably might become friends. It was equally generously bestowed on avowed foes. Because of this, the word "foes" is really inappropriate; for Governor Clauson had no foes. Outsiders, until they had become aware of the kindly character of Maine's late Governor, could not understand why political differences were discussed in Maine without generating more heat.

We suspect that a source of solace to a bereaved family lies not only in an enviable record of achievement, but, even more, in the knowledge that in the memory of the loved one there is a momentum, a living influence, which will affect the course of the future. Such an influence is our legacy. It is not only a legacy of the power of kindliness, but of love of family, concern for the humblest of people, and integrity.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the late Governor Clinton A. Clauson, of Maine, whose victory and election as chief executive of Maine, electrified the country, had served his State and her people with great ability, distinction, and courage. His untimely death is a source of great regret. His death takes from our midst a statesman and leader in public and governmental life that is sadly needed.

To Mrs. Clauson and her loved ones I extend my profound sympathy in their great loss and sorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. McINTIRE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, the sudden passing of the Governor of Maine, the Honorable Clinton Clauson, on December 30 last, took from among us a man who in 1 year in office had become a familiar figure throughout the length and breadth of the State of Maine. Many persons, including myself, were not extended the privilege of personal acquaintanceship until after his election to the governorship.

I had occasion to meet him many times and to share speaking programs with him. I knew him as a kindly man, one who was interested in the welfare of his adopted State.

The Houlton Pioneer Times, of Houlton, Maine, a community in the Third Congressional District, makes an appraisal of the Governor in an editorial of its January 7, 1960, issue, and this editorial follows:

GOV. CLINTON A. CLAUSON

In the sudden and untimely passing of Gov. Clinton A. Clauson, the State of Maine has become deprived of the unselfish service of a dedicated public servant who had a sincere devotion to his duty and a total disregard of any possible consequences of being tirelessly on the job day and night.

Probably no Governor in Maine's history, certainly not in recent years, labored so diligently and was so unceasingly on the go all over Maine, as Governor Clauson was during his first year in office. And this does not subtract one whit from the tremendous service that his predecessors rendered to their State while in office.

Many adjectives have been called into play to apply to the late chief executive and all of them seem to be quite aptly descriptive of the man. He was, above everything else, a person of extreme kindness toward his fellow men and was one of the easiest men to meet that one will encounter in many a day.

His manner was always affable, his demeanor gracious and his personality charming. He had a way of getting along with people of all ages and his easy handling of the hordes of schoolchildren that were forever pouring through the statehouse, was a delight to watch. One couldn't help but wonder how a man, subjected to such constant pressure, could maintain such an even disposition and display a constant charm of manner while shaking hundreds of hands during a busy business day.

He has been called a humble man and this he seems to have been to a considerable degree. He had all of the characteristics of a person constantly conscious of the prestige of his office but never, during 1959, was he ever noticed to use the weight of that office in any other way than fairly and justly.

He was intensely loyal to the political party of which he had been a member all of his life. No fairminded person can or should quarrel with such allegiance which is the private and personal privilege of every man, whether in public life or not.

By the same token, he had a deep devotion to his adopted State of Maine as his constant labors in behalf of its welfare so emphatically attested. As he contributed to the State of Maine while on the job in Augusta, so, too, did he become an ambassador of good will while traveling beyond its borders.

Members of both political parties must agree that he graced the office he held, that he did credit to the State he served, and that his gracious and charming manner will be missed in the statehouse.

Mr. Bernard Esters, the editor of the aforementioned publication, is a member of the all-Republican Governor's Council, and he has, I believe, very well expressed the feelings of all citizens of Maine.

Mr. Esters wrote another column in the same issue of the Houlton Pioneer Times which is of interest and follows:

THOUGHTS AND AFTERTHOUGHTS BY THE EDITOR

I suppose, going back over Maine history, there may have been at some time a funeral display of flowers equal to that which was made possible by the floral tributes that came from everywhere to grace the funeral services of the late Gov. Clinton A. Clauson. But I cannot remember just when that could have been.

The Augusta Armory in which the services were held is several times larger than the Houlton Armory. I would estimate the width to be at least 100 feet in addition to the huge stage which is recessed into the north end. The entire width of the back wall was almost obscured up to 10 feet by the three rows of flowers that stretched from one wall to the other. Added to this was a like number of rows of wreaths, sprays, and bouquets across the back of the stage and spectacular blankets and other arrangements that stood in easels on the floor of the stage.

But even this large area was not sufficient to accommodate a profusion of flowers that certainly dwarfed anything that I have ever seen before at such an occasion. At the back of the hall, opposite the stage and near the doors entering the building, additional bouquets and wreaths were scattered because there was no room for them near the stage. It was no small task to arrange this floral exhibit and it was done with excellent taste.

The armory is supposed to seat 1,500 and it was packed to its capacity. I doubt if another person could have found a place to sit down to listen to the hour-long services as the State of Maine paid its last respects to its chief executive, the second Governor of Maine to die in office in this century.

It probably has happened before to another State in the modern history of this country but one cannot help but wonder how many Commonwealths in this Nation of ours have been administered by four Governors in a single year. When John H. Reed, of Fort Fairfield, was sworn into office last Wednesday night he became the fourth Governor of Maine to serve the State during 1959.

When the then Governor Muskie resigned on January 3 of last year, Robert N. Haskell, of Bangor, was sworn in to serve a short term of 5 days until the official inauguration of Governor Clauson. Governor Clauson, of course, served until his death early Wednesday morning, December 30, and Governor Reed was sworn in as Maine's chief executive the following day, still during 1959.

B.E.E.

Citizens of the Third Congressional District of Maine join with Mrs. McIntire and me in expressing deepest sympathy to Mrs. Clauson and the family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. OLIVER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, in the early hours of the morning of December 30, my friend, Clinton A. Clauson, Governor of Maine, died. It was a sudden and wholly unexpected death. The shock was great and almost unbearable. His devoted wife, Ellen, discovered her faithful teammate of 40 years of wedded life, breathing his last few unconscious minutes of life, without any even remote chance of recovery. It was a tragic and bitter experience.

It was even more tragic and bitter because of its impossibility of human explanation or understanding.

Here was a man of apparent iron constitution. His powers of endurance and his stamina, tested to the utmost during 7 months of the most intensive political campaigning during the primary and general election campaigns of 1958, appeared to be limitless. I, personally, Mr. Speaker, have observed "Doc" Clauson, as our people of Maine affectionately called him, extend himself for hours and days, continuously, as he met and shook hands with thousands of Maine citizens during those grueling campaigns. It was always with a smile of warmth and sincerity to which the people of every rank and station of life responded spontaneously. The political odds were against my friend and he knew it. This only made him the more determined to win. Hard work, long hours, and his friendly personality overcame the odds. He was elected in spite of the odds.

He entered upon his duties immediately after the election, even though his responsibility of office did not officially start until January 7. The interim months were spent at budget hearings and in other wearisome details of making himself familiar with his gubernatorial responsibilities. He took no time off to rest. "Doc" was the type of man who never would shrink from duties and obligations.

Then, after being sworn in as Governor, he continued conscientiously, as always, to administer the affairs of Maine and to deal with a legislature predominantly controlled by the opposition party. He made his opponents not only respect him but also like him. This, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, is one of the greatest attributes of successful leadership. Governor "Clint" was just at the start of a career of political leadership which would have entrenched in Maine the two-party political system which is fundamentally necessary for good and responsible government.

This phase of the late Governor's capacity, Mr. Speaker, points up, as I see it, the real public tragedy inherent in his passing. Public affairs suffer real loss when men of such stature die.

It will be most difficult to replace him in our governmental and political picture. It is impossible to replace him from the family standpoint. With Ellen, his wife, and with Anne and Neil, his daughter and son, and with his grandchildren, we deeply sympathize. As a close political and personal friend, we mourn over his decease. Our only comfort and solace is to determine to carry on in our feeble efforts to emulate him and to help do the job with which he was struggling in order that Maine people might prosper as "Doc" envisioned that they should.

FIGHT OR SURRENDER?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOOLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include an article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOOLEY. The provocative article entitled "Fight or Surrender?" which was published in the December 21, 1959, issue of the U.S. News & World Report provides several viewpoints on the current struggle for world supremacy between the United States and Russia.

The comparative ease with which a nation can be destroyed by means of nuclear attack is frightening to contemplate, and there seems to be no answer to the dilemma in which nuclear armed nations currently find themselves. The power to destroy is offset by the danger of being destroyed by the opposing nation.

The article follows:

THE COMING CHOICE FOR UNITED STATES: FIGHT OR SURRENDER?—STORY OF THE BLACKMAIL BEHIND THE THREAT OF NUCLEAR WAR

(Despite the talk of peace and disarmament, military experts, key officials are worried about the safety of this Nation; balance of terror is seen as no longer an assurance against a nuclear war; Russia—ahead on missiles, gaining in power, dedicated to world dominance—is in a position to blackmail the United States under threat of a nuclear attack; a new official report says the United States is vulnerable, if that attack comes; here are the facts about the danger—from the studies of experts and the analyses of men in a position to know.)

At some point, not many years from now, the American people are likely to be offered this choice: Surrender or fight a nuclear war. And, the way things are going, the United States could lose that war.

These are the studied conclusions of some key officials in the innermost councils of the U.S. Government.

Why? What accounts for this pessimistic attitude at a time when optimism is bursting out on all sides and the world's leaders are talking of peace and disarmament?

The answer, as given by Americans whose lives are spent in assessing powerful forces at work in the world, is complex. It is given in part by a study made for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a research group at Johns Hopkins University. This report was made public December 6. A second study, published by Stanford Research Institute on December 8, gives another part. Yet another study came on December 7 from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund.

Add to these reports the views of highly informed Government officials, and the full answer emerges. It is based upon the following conclusions:

1. The United States is now open and vulnerable to a direct attack by nuclear missiles—and this country's vulnerability is steadily increasing. This was the warning contained in the December 6 report of the Johns Hopkins University research group, whose conclusions are presented later in this text.

2. There can be no guaranteed security in the world when rival systems of government exist, each possessing the means of mass destruction. Nuclear weapons are a fact. Nothing—no agreements, no treaties, no end to tests—can wipe out that fact or can stop science and the human mind from developing weapons of even greater destructiveness. Nuclear weapons, within a few years, will be possessed by many more nations than at present. And the horror of nuclear war may prove no deterrent if a showdown comes. This is brought out in the Stanford Research Institute study of December 8. Another warning that "the possibility of war must be faced" is contained in the Rockefeller Brothers Fund report, the conclusions of which are set forth below.

3. In the world of today, the inexorable trend is toward dominance in the world by a single power. Rival powers or rival groupings of powers inevitably will develop antagonisms—military or economic—and those antagonisms are likely, in the future as in the past, to lead to a test of strength. Only through world dominance by a single power can assurance of safety from nuclear war be established.

4. The United States, at the end of World War II, was in a position to assume world domination. That opportunity was rejected. The United States, ever since, has been retreating gradually from one position after another. Soviet Russia, on the other hand, is demonstrating a determination to rule the world. At the end of World War II, Russia was prostrate. Today—only 15 years later—she is able to challenge America. There is no record in history of such a reversal of positions between nations in so short a time. This Russian success breeds Russian confidence and strengthens Russian determination to push ahead.

5. Soviet Russia, pushing out as United States draws back, is tilting the balance of power steadily in her direction. When that tilt seems to her rulers to be decisive, she then will be tempted to offer the United States the fateful choice: surrender or fight a nuclear war. There may be much testing of strength and many alarms before that showdown comes.

Said an official who sits in the top councils of the U.S. Government:

"I hold the deepest pessimism concerning this Nation's future. The American people appear to lack interest in the life-or-death problem they face, and appear to lack the will to make the sacrifices that their safety calls for. The American Nation seems to lack any tangible objective other than that of making life easier and more enjoyable.

"The American Government, to hold power, is forced to direct its effort toward satisfying the voters' desire for more and more of the good things of life instead of toward assuring safety for the Nation through a dominant position in the world.

"Soviet Russia, by contrast, is hard. As a nation, its objective is fixed. Every move, every action, all the nation's power is directed toward reaching that objective of world domination. Sometimes its progress is slow. Sometimes there are detours. But always the objective is to tilt the world's balance of power against the United States. Today, Russia's challenge is reaching cautiously into Latin America. It is beginning to be felt in Africa. The tide keeps running."

Leading where? As this man and other key thinkers on the power balance of the world see it, the answer is: Toward a time when the United States will be in a corner, facing a choice of surrender or nuclear war.

THE SHIFT THAT KHRUSHCHEV BROUGHT

Soviet Russia, these men say, has rejected the doctrine that a nuclear war is too horrible to contemplate, or that a balance of terror makes nuclear war too dangerous for either side to start. This rejection was made at the time Khrushchev took power. Soviet policy, as now being assessed, is based on the beliefs that nuclear war would not necessarily mean mutual annihilation, that one nation could emerge as a real winner, and that the odds increasingly favor Russia as that winner.

A hard, factual appraisal of what nuclear war might mean, both for Russia and for the United States, is given in the study published by the Stanford Research Institute. According to that study, it would be possible for Russia, striking first, to weather a nuclear counterattack with no more damage than she suffered in World War II.

It is this analysis of Russia's nuclear philosophy that underlies much of the pessimism of American planners.

But isn't disarmament now in the air? Haven't both United States and Russia stopped testing nuclear weapons? Isn't President Eisenhower going to talk again with Nikita Khrushchev to help ease tensions in the world?

The answer to these questions is: Yes. But military men whose business it is to delve deeply into problems of national security say this: Things are not what they seem on the surface. No dictator with a goal and making progress toward that goal ever has given up his advantage—or ever will. No agreement ever will be made by a Soviet dictator that does not involve a gain for him, or what he thinks is a gain for him. Only the United States, among powers which have had the opportunity to accept world direction, has shrunk from that responsibility and drawn back, leaving the field to a dangerous rival.

NO END IN SIGHT FOR THE NUCLEAR RACE

Even while disarmament talk goes on, alarms are being sounded of arms developments to come that will add to war dangers in the years ahead.

Missiles of awesome power and accuracy are being perfected. France today is on the verge of producing atomic weapons, preparing to test those weapons in the Sahara Desert. West Germany now possesses the know-how and probably the means to produce atomic weapons. In one way or another, the Germany of the near future is seen as certain to possess all the modern weapons of mass destruction. So, probably, will Japan.

It is being predicted that Communist China will join the circle of nuclear powers within 10 years. If Red China gets nuclear weapons, then India will feel that she needs them, too.

An official, who is deeply versed in the whole subject, commented:

"There is no way to stop men from thinking. The knowledge needed to produce nuclear weapons is widely held by scientists in nations large and small. In spite of any agreements or treaties, those weapons will be devised and, if necessary, will be tested."

This further statement was made by the same official and supported by others:

"The talk of preventing nuclear war by banning tests of nuclear weapons is deceiving. Its effect is to lull the American people into a false sense of security.

"The facts are simply these: The United States and Soviet Russia both possess large stockpiles of nuclear weapons. The stockpile of the United States at this time almost surely is larger and more varied than that of Soviet Russia. But Russia's stockpile is sufficient to destroy most of America's biggest cities. A ban on tests will not destroy those stockpiles of nuclear weapons.

"The means thus exists for each side to inflict tremendous damage on the other. A stop to testing will not remove that fact.

"Both sides, too, possess the means to deliver those weapons on targets in the other's territory. The United States holds an edge in delivery by manned aircraft. The Soviets hold an edge in delivery by ballistic missiles.

"If nuclear war is really to be curbed, the only way that it can be curbed in today's world is by destruction of every means of delivering nuclear weapons.

"Politicians are not even talking about destroying all aircraft and all missiles and all other possible means of placing nuclear weapons on targets.

"Thus, this whole exercise of talks between United States and Soviet Russia about ending nuclear tests is misleading. Soviet Russia sees an advantage in it for herself, or she would not be sponsoring this deception."
